THE GRACE OF GOD,
—OR—
THE FAITH THAT FAILS NOT.

A young woman just passing out of her twentieth year, was walking one evening over a beautiful lawn in the centre of one of our New England villages, accompanied by an elderly lady who was apparently gliding down the avenues of natural life, on whom the spiritual world was perauturely shedding its beauties. Surely the light of the spiritual sun irradiates her countenance. If not, from whence those scintillations, that we felt rather than saw; that we know, yet could not define?

Her companion was what the world calls beautiful, if symmetry of form, delicacy of features and brilliancy of manner are beauty; if a gentle spirit, sparkling thoughts and graceful dictation constitute beauty. When she conversed, we admired and approved. But when the elder one spoke, we seemed to be walking beside the "river that maketh glad the city of our God."

"Aunt Polly," said Clara, (We all call her by that name, she was aunt to all in the village,) "I think it must be a great deal easier for some persons to be Christian than it is for others."

"Why so, Clara; does not our Lord teach us, 'if any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me.'"

"I am aware," replied Clara, "that all must deny self, if they would be conformed to the will of God. But there appear to be some who love goodness so well, that it seems a pleasure rather than a cross to obey the World."

"Is not the difference more in our position than in those we observe? As we walk here in the centre of this verdant lawn with the river just beyond, and the homes of all our friends about us, we forget that it presented a far different view to us before we ascended the wearying hill, when the rolling ground that was to be passed shadowed the place; thus it was with our Christian life."

"I know aunt P. that I am at the foot of the hill, while many like yourself have reached the lawn. I have often thought that Mrs. Parsons might be classed with those who had found a royal road to the celestial city; it seems to be easier for her to do good than to omit a good act."

"Yet, Clara, Mrs. P. has passed through the most severe of all ordeals, a bad husband. She has indeed been tried as if by fire, and few come out of it so unscathed."

"A bad husband! I have always supposed that Mr. Parsons was an exemplary Christian."

"And so he has been since you have been old enough to know the family. When our little society was small and few in number, when we knew each other almost as well as we know the several members of our family, Mrs. P. came to our little meetings. She was alone in her interests with us, and unaccompanied by friends; but she strengthened us greatly. The worldly maxim, 'Union is strength,' comes originally from the church, as all good does; and he who truly seeks to lead a good life exerts an influence in that very act to help others. As we came to enter into each other's sympathies, we found, that as young as she appeared to be, she was deserted by her husband, and had the sole care of three children, two girls and a little baby boy, bearing its father's name. Their father had by degrees, passed from the upright, intelligent man to the loathsome and desolate drunkard. She had doted upon him indeed she had been the object of many an envious spirit, so promising was her husband at the time of her engagement and marriage. By every possible kindness, she strove to win him back from the vine, but in vain; nothing but infinite power could exercise the demon. Just after her little John's birth he left her. At first she could not believe him gone; she sought him in all his haunts but she found him not. With a wounded spirit and breaking heart she returned to her children. Previously to his leaving her, she had to provide for their food, and those who knew his habits remarked to each other, 'She will be better off without him, for now she will have only herself and children to care for. 'I should be glad if he was out of my way,' said another. But Mrs. Parsons thought otherwise. He was the one for whom she had forsaken all others, and with all the wealth of her love did she cleave unto him. It seemed in his absence a part of her own life was wasting. Dearly as she loved her children as freely as she would have sacrified all for them, her parental love was coldness in comparison with that ever gushing, longing affection, that followed her husband in his wanderings.

"Months lengthened into years, but no tidings or trace of the wanderer. The rail track did not then, as now, interlace our States, and she had not the means to make a very extensive search without she sold her home; this her friends warmly advised her not to do. No one offering any assistance to ascertain where he had gone, she gave up the idea. But she faltered not in her duties. With an unwavering trust in the Almighty arm, she brought his case to her Christian friends, and besought them to aid her in their prayers, that the Lord would restore the wanderer. Often in our social meetings I have heard her plead for his conversion and redemption, and restoration of his family. Some questioned the propriety of bringing family subjects into the meetings. Others wavered but a few said 'The Lord has never given such a cry to the soul to remain unanswered.' At last the day dawned.

"Mrs. P. was often to the bedside of suffering to the children of their father. The younger sister once delighted all the guests over them, dressed gaily and there stood here on the verge, before death made the terrible barrier upon their. Could those words and with tones and prayers as they asked, 'when will papa come home?'

"Lizzie, the eldest, manifested the deepest grief, and only when her mother died was she most sorry that father must cause home a good man would she had a listening ear.

"Upon one of these occasions a knock was heard at the door. Lizzie, indifferent to her mother's conversation, opened it, and a lady handed her a letter. Half glad for her mother's sake, and half in dread lest her father was coming home, she lingered a while before giving it to her mother.

"Mrs. Parsons was very much affected, and could scarcely control her feelings while she read the letter, which proved to be from her husband, stating that the Lord had met him and convinced him of his evil way, and he desired to lead a new life, if she could forgive and receive him again.

"The evening following she brought the letter to our little prayer meeting, and with a heart full of thankfulness asked us to rejoice with her.

"Some doubted his conversion, and pitying her said, it would have been better for her not to have heard from him, and even went so far as to ask her if she thought it could be possible for a man so given up to stand. Her answer was: 'Think so!' as if she scorned a doubt. 'He who hath heard my prayer will also preserve his feet from falling.'

"She sent him a word of welcome and in a few days he was with her.

"His person bore evident marks of long continued dissipation. His flesh was bloated and red; his hair dry and scraggy; his voice trembled and he was altogether broken down. Though it was evident he had made some effort to improve his appearance yet he was sober; the blood-shot eye was gone, and he spoke words of comfort to his family.

"His family had altered in appearance much more than their father. The fine little boy, whom you now know as a respectable man and intelligent Christian, that stood by his knee taking his first intelligent look at his papa, was but a few months old when he left. And the little sister that was running to every one she saw saying, papa is come home—was just learning to walk. Lizzie stood back, as if she thought her father not much better in appearance, but soon yielded to his tender carers, as if she would hope for the best which happily it proved to be.

"I was present the evening he presented himself for membership with us. His statement brought tears to many eyes. He said 'I had been drinking for a week with little intermission, and late in the evening I started to go to the place where I had been staying, when I lost my way and strolled and staggered around till I got into the edge of a piece of woods. Here I fell over a slight rising. I was very stupid and made no attempt to rise. How long I lay there I cannot tell. I slept a drunkard's sleep, and when I awoke it was far into the night. I began to think into what a miserable condition I had come; how I might have laid there and died, and none to bear me to my friends and family. No eye was upon me except the All-seeing eye. None knew where I was; indeed, I knew not myself. Thoughts of home came with returning consciousness, and the languor after excitement that almost forbade my rising. That dread tremor after I had arisen, joined with chills from the exposure, and the damp ground that had been my bed, made me wish for home and a comfortable bed. The happy home I had made miserable and deserted, came up before me; the soothing hand of my loving and kind wife; the innocence of my little children, how it up braided me I resolved—I will go home. I will drink no more. I arose upon my feet in the earnestness of my resolution, quivering and trembling as I did so. Drink no more! answered the burning thirst within me—mocking at my resolve. Drink no more! answered my heaving stomach. I groaned aloud in agony how can I help drinking? Who will help me? And I sank down again upon the sod that had been my bed, feeling that I had no power to contend with the foe of sin, and evil dwelling in me. I thought of my mother, how she had taught me to pray, and child-like I repeated the Lord's prayer, 'Lead us not into temptation, and deliver us from evil.' It gave me hope.

Through the day I avoided those with whom I had been spending my time, lest they should ask me to drink, and falling in with some religious person I went with them to some Methodist meetings. Their earnestness suited my feelings; it seemed to bring me close to them, and helped my resolutions. They prayed for me, and their preaching for me, and to me, and I seemed to be lifted out of the horrible pit and miry clay and placed upon a Rock of Salvation.' Since that time, I have not tasted of anything that intoxicates, and with the help of the Lord I never will."

"Did he continue temperate ever after?"

"Yes until his death, and a more consistent Christian, as you well know, has not walked in our midst. When the Temperance question came up, it was thought best by some not to call upon him as it might awaken an unpleasant thought of his past life. But brother D. pressed the pledge upon all, saying, it could not hinder the word of the Lord, and might be a stay to his resolutions, and he freely signed it.

"You probably recollect his earnest manner, and how frequently he called himself 'a brand plucked from the burning, a sinner saved by grace.'"

"I do; and supposed his peculiar nervousness of manner, and tremulousness of voice the sequence of his former dissipation."

"It probably was. But how do these trials of Mrs. Parson's agree with your easy way of grace, Clara?"

"I see my error was judging from appearances or position, as you term it, and that is by alternate states of conflict and victory over our evils we become regenerated after having put out in the divine life."—Jour. A. T. U.

The above we learn was literally true, and is written out for the encouragement of drunkard wives almost without hope.—Ed. J. A. T. U.

WHAT A GOOD PROPOSAL MAY DO.

Show us the most prosperous family of boys and girls, and the chances are we can show where the most pray that father must cause home a good man would she had a listening ear.

Two Daughters Emancipated by Their Father.

From the Cleveland Leader, June 7.

In the summer of 1857, James Oldham, a 'free white citizen" of Colahoma County Mississippi, left his plantation near Friar's Point, with his two beautiful daughters—one of whom is now 12 and the other 16 years of age—for Oberlin, Ohio, whither he came for the double purpose of emancipating the girls, for they were his slaves.—He was accompanied by Miss Hattie Oldham, a near relative, who came to assist in locating the daughters in their new condition.

At Memphis, the younger daughter, Cyrena, having been the pet of the family, and preferring the known ease of her sunny home to the fancied trials and the dreaded restraints of school, could not be persuaded to come any further on the journey, and her kind father was induced to permit her to return to the plantation, while the balance of the party came on and arrived at Oberlin in August.

The next day after their arrival, Mr. Oldham was attached with typhoid dysentery, and was soon reduced to a critical condition, in which he lingered for three weeks and died. Having formed an acquaintance with Dr. R. L. Rea of Oxford, Butler County, Ohio, and having great confidence in his skill as a physician at Mr. Oldham's request the Doctor came to his bedside, watched over him until death ended his sufferings, and then accompanied his mortal remains back to his desolate home in Mississippi.

When Mr. Oldham became convinced that he must die, his concern for the freedom of his youngest daughter was intense. The eldest, Emeline, was with him in Ohio, and was therefore free; but the younger by lingering amid the loved scenes of her childhood, was exposed to be inventoried among the other chattles of the estate, and sold at a high price because of her light complexion, her beautiful ringlets and her graceful form, and the dying father knew it and bitter anguish stung his soul.

He knew, too, that the laws of Mississippi forbid emancipation within her borders, and further, that he could not by his will make her free to be sent out of the State; nor could he will her in trust to another for the purpose of making her free; neither yet could he sell her to any one for that purpose. Thus was the dying parent beleaguered on every hand by monsterous cruelty of the law, hedging up as it does every way by which he might secure freedom to his child, and thus save her from a dreadful fate. In this strait he applied to the Hon. Philemon Bliss of Elyria for counsel, whose clear head and warm heart were soon enlisted in what would seem the hopeless task of enabling a wealthy father to free his own child from eternal Slavery.

A will was soon executed, in which the facts of the parents earnest wish were clearly set forth, and by the terms of which the daughters were made free, and the sum of $4,600 bequeathed for their support and education, and the noble Dr. Rea was appointed executor of the will.

It is also provided that the whole of the above sum should be expended if necessary, to secure the freedom of the youngest girl should an attempt be made to prevent it by the heirs, under the laws of Mississippi, which wise provision with the energy and firmness of Dr. Rea, proved more than a match for slaveholding cupidity and slaveholding law, as is shown in the fact that both Emeline and Cyrena are now safe in Oberlin, where their wants will be supplied and their education provided for under the direction of Dr. Rea.

But all this has not been accomplished without a severe struggle, every point being warmly contested by greedy heirs with wicked laws on the one side, and the determined Doctor and righteousness on the other For a time it seemed almost certain that the cormorants would succeed, and that the money, as well as the liberty of Cyrena, would be lost; indeed so sure were they of success that the heirs bid Dr. Rea a bold defiance.

At length a point was decided by the Supreme court of Mississippi in a case involving some important ones in this, and the controversy was brought to a close by a compromise, in which Dr. Rea secured the freedom of the girl and $2,000 of the money.

A few days ago Dr. Rea might have been seen leaving the plantation of the late James Oldham as a large canoe freighted with his precious charge, the tender Cyrena an unwilling exile from her childhood's home, and making his devious way for nine miles through recently cut gorges and eddying currents made by the turbid waters of the Mississippi, back to Friar's Point, where he embarked for the purpose of reuniting these sisters at Oberlin, the very place chosen for them by the dying, honest slaveholder, where they can become free citizens, and intelligent women.

DEATH OF A DISTINGUISHED INVENTOR.

Among our recent notices of deaths we find that of Walter Hunt. He came from forty [illegible] to him, been known as an inventor in the city. Whether in mechanical movements, chemistry, electricity, or whatever science, he was always full of inventive ideas, a quiet genius, a clear [illegible] and many [illegible] ing other [illegible] for [illegible] be planned, can now speak. It only remains to state that Mr. Hunter, the inventor. He originated the sewing machine the first machine for cutting brads by one operation, placing plugs in leather for soles of boots and shoes, a method of constructing docks by concrete, preparing a paper pulk so as to form boxes by one operation, the vapor baths, the ball known as Minnie ball for the rifle, and many improvements in fire arms, printing by rollers instead of balls, and so many other things our space will not admit of details. Walter Hunt, like most inventors, devoted his life to his friends rather than to himself; was liberal to a fault, and none knew but to love him; he struggled with that monster, the dollar, all his life, in hopes of mastering; yet his numberless experiments kept him always poor. Notwithstanding his life of exertion has benefitted the world—he dies, as most inventors do, at the very moment he anticipated success. He however lived to the ripe age, of 63 years in full vigor until the last four days of his life.—N. Y. Tribune.

Dreadful Tragedy

A dreadful tragedy has just been enacted near the village of Ballinsloe, in Ireland.

From the evidence given before the coroner's inquest it appears that Mr. R. Burke, who up to the present had been acting as land agent to the Hon. Martin Ffrench, had been residing in the house of St. Brandon's, on the property of his employer. It was arranged that he should give it up for the use of young Mr. Ffrench but recently married. Mr. Ffrench arrived at Ballinamore Park, the seat of his father, on Tuesday morning, as early as three o'clock, and immediately proceeded to St. Brandon's to awaken Mr. Burke, who, however, had gone to Ballinamore, about three miles distant, intending to go that morning to Ballinasloe. Captain Ffrench entered the house, called for writing materials, and wrote a note couched in the kindest terms to Mr. Burke, desiring him to come to St. Brandon's at once, as he wished to see him on important business.—Mr. Burke received the note, and without delay, hastened to St. Brandon's. When the parties met, their greeting was cordial. After a brief interview, Mr. Burke and Captain Ffrench journeyed together on a car to Killyan, the residence of Mr. Cheevers, J. P., the Captain stating that he had business with that gentleman. On arriving at Killyan, Captain Ffrench got out of the car and inquired for Mr. Cheevers, but was unable to see him. The Captain said it was of no consequence, as he would write him a few lines, and then rejoined Mr. Burke on the car and directed the driver to proceed to Ballinamore Park, the seat of the Hon. Martin Ffrench. They arrived at the Park, it is supposed shortly before eleven o'clock; having discharged the car they went on foot together through the plantation towards the garden. From the moment they entered the plantation all certain knowledge of their movements ends, but the dreadful catastrophe, that followed is elucidated by the subsequent discoveries. It was known in the village of Ballinamore during the afternoon, that Captain Ffrench and Mr. Burke had come their that morning on a car, and that they alighted at the gate entrance to the park, on the high road to proceed through the grounds. A good deal of surprise was manifested by gentlemen who heard this at the prolonged absence of the parties. At five o'clock in the evening, Madden the game-keeper of the Hon. Martin Ffrench, while passing the plantation, discovered the dead body of Mr. Burke lying face on the ground, pierced by two bullets, one of which entered on the left side and passed through the breast; the other through the centre of the back.—Where this bullet entered, the coat was singed, indicating that the muzzle of the pistol was close to the person of the deceased when the discharge took place. The alarm was at once given, and the authorities hastened to the spot. Inquiries were made for Captain Ffrench, but he could not be found. The scene now changes to Clonbrock demesne, four miles distant from Ballinamore. The demesne is thickly wooded, and bounded on one side by an extensive bog, at present studded by a number of turf clamps. One of Lord Clonbrock's laborers with his game-keepers was on the bog between one and two o'clock in the afternoon, and they saw at some distance from them the figure of a man moving in an excited manner among the turf clamps. They were unable from the distance to recognise him, but he appeared to be a gentleman. They soon lost sight of the figure. At two o'clock, or shortly afterwards, the labourer heard the report of fire-arms, but felt no surprise, as he thought the game-keeper was firing. This labourer, whose name is John Crehon, left off work at seven o'clock in the evening, and proceeded homeward. His way was near to the place where the figure was seen in the early part of the day. He had not gone more than 100 yards or so when he observed a man lying asleep, as he conceived, against one of the turf heaps. He recognised him as the person he had previously seen on the bog, but as he approached nearer his attention was attracted to a pistol which lay on the ground near to the body. Alarmed at this, Crehon ran away. He met another labourer and game-keeper, to whom he communicated what he saw. The three men returned to the body; they were struck with horror at finding that it was the corpse of Captain Ffrench, whose person they knew; blood was oozing from the mouth, but at first they could see no marks of violence on the body. On closer examination they found a bullet wound on the left breast. Captain Ffrench must have opened his waistcoat and fired the pistol close to his breast. The body was removed to the game-keepers lodge at Clonbrock. Captain Ffrench's dress consisted of a black coat, dark vest and trousers, with light bottle cloth coat over half way up, showing that he had evidently thought of the [illegible] [illegible] and many other [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

THE BATTLE OF MAGENTA.

ITS STRATEGIC RESULTS.

A victory has been achieved by the French arms which may take its place beside the most renowned names in the annals of the French nation. The little town of Magenta, on the Lombardy side of the Ticino, and about five miles eastward of the bridge of Buffalora, over which the Austrian forces are pressed upon five weeks ago in the onset of Buonaparte, in the shadow of this great disaster. The French electric wire bonsts of 5,000 prisoners and of 15,000 Austrians killed or wounded by land, if we may believe that the numbers even approximate to those enormous figures, it is impossible to doubt that a battle has been fought which is decisive of the campaign. The great invading army is now become a flying multitude, more or less kept together by the habits of discipline; but Milan is open, Pavia and Piacenza remain like Austrian uplands in a plain flooded by French and Italian troops, and there does not seem to be any serious resistance on the western side of the great line of Austrian fortresses. More ample dispatches, and details at which we cannot now even guess, may diminish the importance of this imposing bulletin, and may lessen the numbers of the Austrian loss; or we may possibly hear of a slaughter among the French which may take from the decisive character of the victory. But as we receive so we give it forth. Thirty hours ago a despatch left the field of Magenta, and announces in London that 15,000 Austrians are killed and wounded, and that 5,000 prisoners are in the hands of the victors. These are the only ascertained facts; but, connecting them with the statements of our correspondents, we are not without some means of guessing at the operations which must have preceded this decisive result. * * * * *

When this usually sluggish Power started so unexpectedly into action, we expected to see her move rapidly upon Turin, blockade the passes of the Alps, cut off the communication with Alexandria, and make an attempt upon Genoa. It was a quick scheme for an Austrian imagination, but, if there was no design of this character, every one asked what could be the object of this sudden fit of military ardour. It is, however, that there was no plan worthy of being called a campaign; that there was nothing better than the old plans of the Aulic Council, which Napoleon used to read first, and which the Austrian Generals afterwards received and clumsily carried on. * * * * *

The Austrians had tarried in the plains while the Allied force was growing; they began to retreat when they found it mature in strength. We have already several times pointed the obvious consideration that it would be madness for the Austrians to risk a battle on the Sardinian side of the swollen river Ticino. It was quite clear that if they retreated at all they would retire beyond that point. On Saturday night they had reached the banks of the river, and were prepared to cross it at the fords and bridges they had traversed when they came as invaders. To cover this movement Gyulai ordered a feint upon Mortara, which they had just before abandoned, and which was possibly occupied by the Sardinians and Zouaves, ever pressing upon the Austrian rear. This was the decisive moment which had been foreseen in the French camp, and which the allied force had been manœuvred to meet. While the Austrians were retreating, the French columns that had been concentrated on the left bank of the Po, where they had deceived the Austrians into the belief that the object of the French attack was Piacenza, were suddenly moved away westwards and dashed across the Po, probably at Casale. The line then joined the Sardinian and Zouave troops, which had just won the battle of Palestro, and formed a complete line parallel with that of the retreating Austrians. The right wing of the Austrians appears to have been weakened by the direction of the retreat, which is stated to have been upon Beregnardo.—Upon this weakened right wing, engaged in the passage of the river at the Bridge of Buffalora, the French attack seems to have fallen, and the French and Sardinians appear to have followed the retreating enemy over the bridge, and to have ultimately defeated him at the village about two miles on the other side of the river.

Of course, these are speculations which detailed accounts of this battle must either confirm, or modify, or destroy. We put them only as probabilities deducable from the previously known facts. Meanwhile Paris is bright with universal illumination, Milan is welcoming her new master, and Italy is rejoicing in a hope of recovered nationality. We wish we could add with some authority for its truth that the Emperor of the French is moderate in the hour of victory, and that humbled Austria is satisfied to evacuate Lombardy and to be at peace.

BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Dates from British Columbia are to the 14th May, from which we select the following interesting items of news:

The number of men at the mines were rated at from 2,000 to 3,000, and the amount of gold shipped from April 11 to May 10, was $120,000.

An attempt has been made to fit out an exploring expedition to Queen Charlotte's Island.

The exploring parties despatched by the Governor when he represented the Hudson's Bay Company, were composed of Company's officers, under the guidance of Indians, who collected much useful information, and mapped portions of country before unexplored; but no practical route for the conduct of traffic was discovered from the coast into the interior to the north of Fraser River, which therefore continues the only inlet and highway into the mining country.

The Langley journals, only some months back at auction netted £6,201 10s. 5d. after paying £350 6s. 10d. of expenses attending their disposal; and there is still some, these extra lots were made on spec, that, to be surveyed, as another site has been fixed upon the capital.

Langley, down in a slough, [illegible] Fraser, and Derby, [illegible] Most of those [illegible] Langley, [illegible] Mr. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to make a thrust with a bayonet? Hold my, I'll show you how it is done!"

And he buried this terrible weapon to the hilt in the body of the Austrian.

What can you do against such men!

One thing, which still continues to be surprising, is the extreme youth of the soldiers whom we make prisoners. Most of them are only 16, 17, and 18 years old. This youth may partially explain the way in which these poor soldiers give themselves up.

A corporal who was bringing in five prisoners to the bivouac, pushes them towards his captain.

"Take these Captain," said he, here are five of them. The business is getting irksome; I was not made to drive lambs."

And he goes off furious.

For the whole day after the 23rd, these poor fellows shivering, and not daring to move, were gathered up in the rice-fields. Quiet once, they behave like angels.

All this, perhaps, will change before the famous quadrangle.

Yesterday cannon grunted occasionally. A shell tossed the Tiolon allowed us to hear it distinctly, but the detonations were slow. The Austrian army has this habit of shooting on a retreat, perhaps to enliven their march. So too, when they perceive a squadron on guard, they send three or four balls, which hiss a few vines and wound two or three mulberry trees and that is all.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

From Newfoundland papers we learn the arrival of the Commissioners appointed by the British and French Governments to take evidence with a view to a settlement of the difficulties with reference to the fishery rights of both nations. The object of the Commissioners may be more specifically and correctly defined as being to ascertain the infringements by British subjects of treaty rights enjoyed or claimed by the French, and the infringements by the French fishermen of British rights, existing irrespective of treaty, and in virtue of Britains sovereignty in those parts. The investigation is no doubt of importance, and the information which it will elicit may furnish reliable data on which to deal with some of the statements by which the French attempt to support their claims. But it is evident that whatever the result may be it will have no effect in the way of reducing the French to recede from the position they have taken up. As we have repeatedly pointed out, the difference of opinion relates entirely to the interpretation of the treaty under which the French enjoy their privileges of fishery. They claim an exclusive right which the British Government deny. If the denial be adhered to, why send out Commissioners to ascertain if there has been any breach of a right which is not admitted to exist? If the French merely claimed to enjoy in mare fidi the preferential right of fishing, undoubtedly conveyed to them on the northern part of the Island, the Commission might have a practical use in supplying information, on which the British authorities might adopt proceedings with a view to secure their rights to the French. But this is not the position of the French. They make no appeal to the British Government in the case. They have given intimation of their intention to enforce their alleged rights, and the enforcement means driving British settlers from the coast and British fishermen from the sea. Pending the present inquiry, which has been merely agreed to as a matter of courtesy to the British Government, no actual steps will be taken, but when the labors of the Commission are terminated, the position of affairs will again become the same as before the Commission was appointed. Will the French then be allowed to enforce claims which are not admitted by the British Government, and the enforcement of which implies a great violation of British sovereignty and British soil? For whatever privileges the French may claim in virtue of the loose wording of the treaty, it gives them no right whatever to enforce any claims which they might put forward.—They may appeal to the British Government to restrain its subjects from infringing on their rights; but if the British Government should fail to do so, France certainly cannot assume the functions of the British authorities and act in their stead. Yet this is what the French have notified their intention of doing. What effect the present state of European affairs may have in inducing them to recede from this insolent attitude of aggression remains to be seen; but we have not a shadow of a doubt that this Newfoundland difficulty in a train to be really prepared, by which the Emperor may either at pleasure exemplify his dominance over the Government of England or provoke a quarrell in which he might enlist the sympathy of his subjects for the material interests of France. That there has been a concealed motive for the action of the French in this matter is proved beyond all doubt, by the fact that their proceedings are not directed against any actual competition on the part of the British fishermen. The settlements which the French have intimated their intention to remove have hitherto been directly encouraged by them as a great convenience to their fishermen. The object, therefore, is evidently to raise an artificial issue, either with a view to extort concessions such as were embodied in the Convention of 1857, which the Colony repudiated, or for purposes of more general and Imperial policy. Looking to the spirit that prevails in the Colony, it is impossible that the matter can be settled peaceably, except by the French retiring from their aboured and insolent pretentions, for the British Government has not the power, even though it had the disposition, so abundantly manifested by Lords Palmerston and Clarendon, to sacrifice the Colonial rights.—Scottish American Journal.

Portraits of the Rivals.

The public mind has an instinctive curiosity to learn something of the personal appearance of the three champions who are contending for the mastery in the vicinity of the Pirates' The Philadelphia North American affords a brief sketch of them, which represents the three principal actors in the puzzling tragedy, as those of the philosophers in Europe. Louis Napoleon is called short, forbidding in feature, and has less the air of his body; he appears to no advantage when seated or on horseback, because the great size of his legs to his body is disproportionate. Victor Emanuel has a broad, manly face, and positively subject quiet. He is the most athletic looking personage of the three. Francis Joseph is a handsome man, with a fine head, but his action and attitude are not graceful; but his action and attitude are not graceful; but his action and attitude are not graceful;

Family Recipes.

CHERRY TART.—Stone and stew what you consider a suitable quantity of cherries, adding to sweet sugar as you prefer, and also some sticks of cinnamon. Toast some small, thin slices of bread; put a layer of it on the bottom of a dish, then a layer of cherries, and so on until the dish is filled. The juice should be flavored with a small portion of wine. Serve this dish cold.

BROWN SAUCE FOR HOT OR COLD ROAST BEEF.—Grate or scrape very fine, some horse-radish, a little made mustard, some pounded white sugar, and pour a spoonful of vinegar. Serve in a saucer.

BREAD AND-BUTTER PUDDING.—Slice bread, spread with butter, and lay it in a dish with currants between each layer; and sliced citron, orange, or lemon. Pour over as unboiled custard of milk, two or three eggs, a few pinenieos, and a very little rotatin, two hours at least before it is to be baked; and lay it over to soak the bread. A paste looks better, but is not necessary.

DOUGHNUTS.—Rub a quarter of a pound of butter into a pound of flour, then add five ounces of sugar, two eggs, a tablespoonful of yeast, and sufficient warm milk to make it into a stiff paste. Let it stand to rise, then roll it out, and cut it into shapes with a paste cutter, and boil them as hard until they are nicely browned.

MUFFINS.—Mix two pounds of flour, two eggs, two ounces of butter melted in a pint of warm milk, add three or four spoonfuls of yeast: when light, bake, in butter, in a quick oven.

HOE CAKE.—Scald a quart of Indian meal with a pint of water; stir in two teaspoonfuls of salt, and a little butter melted; pat it, when properly mixed, into a buttered tin, and bake it half an hour.

WINCHESTER PUDDING.—Half pound of suet, half pound of sugar, and half a pound of bread crumbed with four eggs, and the rind and juice of one lemon.

BY-LAW No.—

A By-Law to authorize the Mayor of the Town of Peterborough, to raise by way of loan, the sum of one thousand five hundred pounds, for the purposes therein specified, and to issue Debentures therefor, and provide for the payment thereof.

Passed the day of A. D. 1859.

WHEREAS, the Municipality of the Town of Peterborough, did on the fifteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, pass a By-Law authorising the Mayor of the said Town, to take three thousand shares of stock in the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway Company, on behalf of the said Municipality

And Whereas, the said Municipality did borrow from the Municipal Loan Fund, Debentures, to the extent of twenty-five thousand pounds currency, and did also issue Debentures under a By-Law passed on the tenth day of May, A. D., 1859, to the extent of twelve thousand five hundred pounds, for the purpose of paying the stock so subscribed as aforesaid.

And Whereas the sum of eight hundred and twenty-five pounds, is still required to pay the balance of the said stock so subscribed, and the expenses attending the negotiation of the aforesaid Debentures.

And Whereas the sum of two hundred and seventy-five pounds is required to pay the Government for the balance due on the Land, at the South end of the Town, and the claims of the Squatters thereon.

And Whereas it is desirable and necessary to expend in grading, gravelling, and otherwise improving the streets of the said Town of Peterborough, the sum of four hundred pounds, making in all for the objects enumerated above, the sum of one thousand five hundred pounds.

And Whereas it will require Debentures to be issued to the amount of two thousand pounds, to realize the said sum of one thousand five hundred pounds.

And whereas it will require the sum of three thousand two hundred pounds, to be raised by a special rate, for the payment of such loan, and interest thereon, for the space of ten years, to be computed from the day of A. D., 1859, to the day of A. D., 1869, exclusive of the first and last days, by annual amounts as follows, that is to say:

For the year 1860, the sum of £320.

1861	"	320
1862	"	320
1863	"	320
1864	"	320
1865	"	320
1866	"	320
1867	"	320
1868	"	320
1869	"	320

And Whereas it is proposed that Debentures to the amount of Two Thousand Pounds shall be issued, payable with interest at six per cent. as hereinafter mentioned for the purposes aforesaid.

And Whereas the assessed value of the whole ratable property of the said Town of Peterborough amounts to the sum of Seventeen Thousand six hundred and eighty one pounds according to the assessment returns thereof for the year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Fifty Eight being the financial year next preceding the year of the passing of this By-Law.

And Whereas it is necessary for the payment of the interest aforesaid and for the creation of a sinking fund for the payment of the principal money of such loan to raise ten annual special rates in the pound upon the total value of the whole of the ratable property as hereinafter described, viz:

For the year

1860	four pence	}	the	of a penny in the pound.
1861	"		"	"
1862	"		"	"
1863	"		"	"

1865	"		"	"
1866	"		"	"
1867	"		"	"
1868	"		"	"
1869	"		"	"

over and above and in addition to all other rates and assessments imposed, for the payment of the said interest and for the creation of a sinking fund, for the payment of the principal money of the said debentures, according to the requirements of the statutes in such cases made and provided.

And Whereas this By-law has been and was approved of, by a majority of the duly qualified Municipal Electors of the said Town of Peterborough ascertained in the manner pointed out in the 192nd section of the Upper Canada Municipal Act.

Be it therefore enacted by the Town Council of the Town of Peterborough, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that for the purpose of raising the said sum of One Thousand Five Hundred Pounds for the purposes aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the Mayor of the said Town of Peterborough for the time being, and he is hereby authorized, and required to issue Debentures upon the credit of the said Town of Peterborough to some not less than One Hundred Pounds each, and bearing interest at six per cent per annum, to the extent of Two Thousand Pounds as aforesaid, to be under the common seal of the said Town, to be signed by the Mayor and countersigned by the Clerk thereof, to be made payable in ten years from and after the passing of this By-law. The interest to be payable at the office of the Town Treasurer, half yearly on the days of and respectively, in and for each of the said ten years.

And be it enacted by this By-law shall come into force and take effect on the day of A. D. 1859.

TAKE NOTICE

THAT the above is a true copy of a proposed By-law which will be taken into consideration by the Council of said Municipality after one month from the first publication in the Peterborough Review, the date of which first publication will be Thursday the fifth day of June, A. D. 1859, and that the votes of the electors of the said Town will be taken on the fourth Ward, in the Library Room, on Friday the first day of July next, at 10 o'clock A. M. and continue open until 4 o'clock P. M. Robert Lang, Esq., Assessor, will preside at the Polling Office. For the Centre Ward in the Library Room, on Saturday the first day of July next, at 10 o'clock A. M. Robert Lang, Esq., Assessor, will preside at the Polling Office. For the Ward in the Library Room, on Monday the first day of July next at the hour of 9 o'clock A. M. Robert Lang, Esq., Assessor, will preside at the Polling Office. And for the East Ward in the Court House, on Friday the first day of July next at 10 o'clock A. M. Robert Lang, Esq., Assessor, will preside at the Polling Office.

PHONOGRAPHY, OR WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six; So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned orator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 200 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

THE MERCHANTILE ANGEL.

CHAPTER I.

"The contemptible little jackanapes! he had the audacity to ask me to play whist with him!" exclaimed Sophia Danvers to her sister.

"And why should he not, sister?" answered Mary Danvers, calmly.

"Why should he not, indeed! Did he think I would demean myself by playing whist with a clerk—one of my father's servants?" and Sophia tossed her hair in proud disdain.

"I can see no impropriety in your associating with him, Sophia. He is certainly a handsome, intelligent, and well-behaved young man

"Behaves well enough, for aught I know but only think of it—a clerk in our drawing room! For my part, I wonder how father could ever think of such a thing as admitting him into the family."

"I suppose it was because he liked the looks of him."

"What will Mr. Augustus Fitzherbert say when he finds us associating with poor clerks—the trash of counting rooms?"

"It matters little to me what he thinks; he is a conceited puppy, and I wonder that you can endure his presence," replied Mary smartly.

"But he is the leader of the ton, Mary,' said Sophia, astonished at the plebeian notions of her sister.

"He is a perfect flat, for all that, and infinitely inferior, in all that constitutes a man, to Mr. Harlowe, whom you affect to despise."

The conversation was interrupted by the entrance of Mr. Danvers.

"How could you bring that horrible clerk into the house, papa?" said Sophia, as the merchant prince seated himself by the blazing grate.

"Horrible clerk! Pray, what is the matter with him?" asked Mr. Danvers, evincing some surprise at the plain speech of his daughter.

"Why, he is a clerk."

"But a respectable young man."

"Respectable enough, but not fashionable, papa."

"I was a clerk once, Sophia; I commenced by sweeping out a store, and carrying bundles about the city."

"How absurdly you talk, papa!"

"But Mr. Harlowe is a very estimable young man; I am confident you will find him agreeable company."

"I shall have nothing to say to him," replied Sophia, with a shrug of the shoulders.

"Beware, Sophia; there is an old proverb; you know, about entertaining angles unawares."

Sophia laughed heartily at the idea of a poor clerk being an angel.

"But what says Mary?" asked the merchant, turning to his gentle-hearted daughter.

"O, I like him very much; we are already fast friends," replied Mary, and a slight blush seemed to emphasize the remark.

"Just like her, papa, I should not wonder if she got head over heels in love with your merchantile angel"

She must do as she pleases about that," replied Mr. Danvers, smiling.

"Pooh, Sophy! who said a word about falling in love? Can't a body be civil to a young gentleman without falling in love with him?"

The pretty Mary blushed as she spoke, in good earnest—blushed as palpably that her father began to think the affair was something more than a mere jest.

"But pray, papa, when does your new partner arrive?" asked Sophia. "If all the accounts I have heard of his wit, gallantry, and personal attractions are true, I shall certainly set my cap for him."

"He will appear one of these days," replied Mr. Danvers.

"I hope you will not keep this stupid clerk in the house after he comes."

"I certainly shall."

"But, papa, we shall 'lose caste' if you do; it is really abominable."

"Small loss, my child. If we are dependent upon the apes and puppies of fashionable life for our position in society, the sooner we loose it the better for our own self-respect," said Mr. Danvers, smiling good humoredly.

"You are absurd, papa."

"Now, Sophy, you have given me a lesson, let me give you one. The idol you worship is more senseless than those of the Feegee Islands. Fashionable society is as hollow as a brass pan; place no reliance upon it. The fops and fools that follow in your train are as soulless as they are brainless."

"I wish Mr. Augustus Fitzherbert could hear you say so, sir," said Sophia.

"Mr. Augustus Fitzherbert was a journeyman barber in New Orleans less than a year ago. I had the honor of being shaved by him last winter when I was there."

"O, horrid, papa! Why have you not exposed him?"

"Why should I my child? He is as good a fellow, as sensible a person, and according to your statement, as fashionable a man, as Mr. Fanteak, whose great grandfather was governor of the state."

"Is it possible that Mr. Fitzherbert was a barber?" exclaimed Sophia, horrified at the appalling statement.

"Nothing else, my child."

"An impostor!" added Mary.

"Just so. Probably he is trying to obtain a rich wife."

"It is abominable, I declare! One hardly knows nowadays who is respectable and who is not," said Sophia.

"Therefore, my children, we ought not to speak so disparagingly of persons in humble life as you have to-night.

"Pooh! a clerk!"

At this moment, Mr. Harlowe, the new clerk, entered the room, and, as Sophia would have expressed it, had the impudence to seat himself by the side of Mary Danvers, who appeared not at all averse to his familiarity with her.

[illegible]

young man; said Sophia, if the [illegible]

forgives him for being a clerk, would have appreciated his society quite as highly as did her sister.

With her father's permission, Mary accepted an invitation from Frederic to attend Alboni's concert.

They had scarcely left the house before Mr. Augustus Fitzherbert was ushered into the sitting room. This gentleman was an exquisite of the "first water." In his personal appearance, he certainly was sufficiently well endowed to challenge the admiration of the fair sex; but, unfortunately he was sadly lacking in that necessary element of a man of sense—brains.

Sophia could scarcely refrain from expressing the contempt she felt for the journeyman barber in disguise. The leader of the ton, in her estimation, was a ruined man.

The dandy, as a matter of courtesy, inquired for Mary, and was informed that she had gone to the concert with Mr. Harlowe.

"With Mr Harlowe—a clerk—aw!" said the ex-journeyman barber, with a sneer as he twirled up the long "rat tail" of his mustache.

"A very worthy man," replied Mr. Danvers.

"No doubt of it aw, but a clerk—aw."

"Pray, were you never a clerk, Mr. Fitzherbert? I was."

"A clerk! No, saw—never!"

"Did I not meet you in New Orleans last winter?"

The dandy started up like a parched pea from a hot pan.

"I have a faint recollection of having met you in a barber's shop there," continued the merchant, tormentingly.

"Aw, very likely, saw. I patronize the barbers."

"And, now I think of it, you wore a little white apron, and, if I mistake not, I had the pleasure of being shaved by you in person."

"Quite a mistake, saw, I assure you."

Suddenly Mr. Augustus Fitzherbert, whose real name was John Sinike, remembered an imperative engagement, and hastened to take his leave.

He was seen to enter the cars for New York on the following day, and nothing has been heard of him since.

CHAPTER II.

Of course the reader understands that Frederick Harlowe and Mary are deeply, irretrievably in love with each other by this time. The poor clerk had won his way to the heart of the fair girl, and she, poor thing, had been captivated by the many attractions, the noble soul, of him who offered incense before her shrine.

As the world goes, it would be deemed a very wicked thing for a poor clerk to fall in love with the daughter of his aristocratic employer. Some people would say it is ungrateful in him thus to spirit away the affections of a confiding girl, when his position and prospects did not warrant his presuming to be her husband.

These questions are still open to the casuist. He may debate them to his entire satisfaction; but Mr. Danvers, either because he was more sensible than many of the aristocratic merchants of the day, or for some other equally potent reason, neglected to make any fuss about the matter, and suffered the clerk to woo and win his daughter, without even remonstrating against the wickedness of the act.

But Sophia was deeply grieved at her sisters folly, as she deemed it, and used all the arguments in the range of her shallow sophistry to dissuade her from the folly and madness of wedding a clerk.

Mary was obstinate. The only excuse she offered in palliation of the flagrant misdemeanor was, that she loved him; and if she loved a scavenger, she would cling to him with the last breath she was permitted to draw.

"A ring!" exclaimed Sophia, one day, when matters appeared to have taken a very decided turn. "Well, well, I suppose you are engaged."

"We are, Sophia," replied Mary, with a face radiant with happiness.

"And you intend to be married?"

"Certainly we do; that is the end of an engagement."

"My conscience! to think that the daughter of a merchant prince should become the wife of a poor insignificant clerk!"

"Nothing very alarming about it, Sophy; it would'n't be half so ridiculous as another daughter of a merchant prince becoming the wife of an ex-journeyman barber. I believe Mr. Augustus Fitzherbert was your beau ideal of what a fashionable husband ought to be."

"The impostor!"

"I am at least sure that Frederic is not an impostor—a humbug; one would not be likely to assume the character of a clerk."

"Perhaps not; but pray sister, when do you intend to become the wife of this counting room cherub?"

"The day has not been fixed yet; in the spring, probably."

"And may I ask what you intend to do with yourself? His salary is only a thousand dollars a year."

"We can get very along well on that sum."

"Yes, I suppose so, and live in some ten footer in a dark alley."

"We intend to live in a nice little cottage."

"Y-e-s! a nice little cottage!" drawled Sophia, in derision. "O sis, I will show you how to live when I am married.—Now of your nice little cottages for me.—But I wonder when the new partner is coming."

"Papa told me this morning that he had deferred the arrangement till next spring, and that the gentleman would attend to his business at the south as heretofore."

"How provoking! I have been reserving my affections on purpose for him. I mean to make a conquest for him in just one month."

"Some foolish pun with Sophy! One would think you had suddenly forgotten your unfortunate engagement."

LIVING TO PURPOSE.

Nearly a hundred years ago there lived a young man, on the frontiers of Virginia, without money and without a name, dependent on his daily labors for a living; and in the absence of any other special aim in life, he concluded to undertake to educate, at his own expense, a youth who seemed to him to be one of more than ordinary promise. What were the thoughts of Gideon Ritchie, when plowing and hoeing corn, and chopping wood, and mauling rails; what visions of the future he indulged in during the hours of weary labor, we may never know. He must have covered a warm heart, and a high purpose, and a stern resolve, in that home-spun dress of wool, and moccasin and hunting-shirt, which characterized those who lived on the farthest frontiers of a semi-civilization; for he worked on, without faltering, until he saw his protegee a minister of the Gospel, who rose like a star in the western firmament, casting its beams of light into the wigwam of the Indian of the West, and away back again into the saloons of the elite about "Boston Common." Young Ritchie died, and but for the shining of his adopted son, his name would long since have passed from the memory of men. But he was placed here for a purpose, by the providence of God, and having answered that purpose with a will, his heart being in the right place, he has doubtless gone up higher, for an enduring reward among the blessed.—Had its hero an unwilling instrument, still the purpose would have been subserved in some way, but he would have lost the reward.

The young minister became the founder of academies, and schools, and seminaries. Now a leader of the politics of his country, and then of soldiers of the cross; now at the head also church, then at the head of a college. Now, as we have heard him sing, disappearing with that expression of pure, full, flowing notes issuing from the organ of the Head's Grove, accompanied by his violin, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

DANGER AHEAD!

The issue of Solferino has dispelled all illusion as to the military strength of France. Only a week ago the blindfold party in England were trying to reassure the alarmed commercial centres of the country by proclaiming that the Austrians would be beaten satisfactorily but slowly, and that the French could be exhausted at the same moment that Italy was cleared of the foreigner; and then the next news we heard was of a victory which, whether complete or incomplete, proves the French armies to be as dangerous as they were sixty years ago. It is not now to be doubted that there exists a power in Europe capable of overrunning the entire Continent. The Austrians fight better than they did in the Revolutionary war, and are much less stupidly manœuvred, but the ratio of superiority is exactly what it was. Ever since the year 1815, and under all Governments, the art of war has been more earnestly studied in France than any other branch of enquiry; and we now see the zealous attendance of forty years rewarded by a knowledge of all the processes and appliances of campaigning, an economists an almost to make up for the loss of that passionate energy which confounded and subdued the world. That France is infinitely better equipped for contest than she was at the beginning of the century, none but a fool will deny. That the strength of her enemies has not increased in the same proportion, the events of the last fortnight have established. Under such circumstances it is still insisted that the policy of England should be regulated by faith and not by sight—by simple trust in the word of Emperor Napoleon, and not by knowledge of his power!

The prowess of the French battalions, and the dexterity with which they have been handled, do not furnish half as much surprise though as the rapidity with which they have been transferred to their destined battle-ground. In three weeks an enormous, splendidly appointed, and excellently provided army has been conveyed from the north and centre of France to the middle of the plains of Lombardy.—This feat has been accomplished after a series of assurances from the French Government that it has made no preparations for war. It is absolutely immaterial whether this statement was offered in good faith or in bad. If it was really true that the French establishments were in their ordinary condition, we can only ask, with sincere alarm, what they are like when in a state of extraordinary efficiency? If these be peace establishments, what does France understand by a war footing? If this be credity, what is preparation? If these things are done in the green wood, what shall be done in the dry? In truth, the best consolation England could receive would be proof of her ally's entire insincerity when he protested that he was no readier than usual for an attack on his neighbours. If, in fact, he deceived us egregiously, and was really straining every nerve to put in order his commissariat, his siege apparel, and his means of transport, we may take some comfort from the thought that such an enemy as we now see in Lombardy is not the product of an every day state of things. It is another question whether it is quite reassuring to know that this preparation can be effected with the utmost secrecy, and that English Governments are capable of being blinded to it by a fair-sounding phrase.

Each of the two English parties seem to be as much alive as the other to the duty cast upon an English ministry by the spectacle of a war ushered in by such diplomacy and conducted with such results. The French alliance is hugged to the heart by both of them, though that connection has long since ceased to imply more than an obligation to believe what the French Government chooses to assert. Now, the consequence of believing implicity the assurances of a man of the Buonaparte character at the head of the French soldiery, have been twice illustrated on the grandest scale—once in the time of the First Napoleon, and once in that of the Third. At the beginning of the century, there was a Franco-French alliance as sincere, as natural, and as equitable, as the Anglo-French alliance of the present day. Prussia made up her mind to "the strict neutrality," when her illustrious friend went to war with power after power identified with her by the common closest interest. She mistrusted, and was soothed. She mistrusted again, and was soothed, perhaps a trifle more contemptuously than the first. She was even allowed to offer herself as mediator between the conqueror and those who had their eyes open to his designs; and, though she was never successful, she was courteously thanked for her interference. Nay, she was even permitted to share in the spoil, and overcame her scruples about appropriating Hanover by the reflection that the King of Great Britain had been so very obstinate in refusing her good offices. It was till obstacles to universal conquest had been crushed with her connivance that the insolence of her ally became intolerable, and she flew to arms. Then came the field of Jena, and Prussia was plainly told that Napoleon despised her for her credulity, and had always intended to punish her for having presumed to win a victory over the French fifty years before at Rosbach. Is there no lesson in all this for England? We, too, have our Rosbach, for which revenge is one day to be taken, and we call it Waterloo. We, too, have our Hanover, which is offered as a bribe to neutrality, and it is called Italian nationality. We, too, have seen our good offices always accepted, except when they would have prevented a war. We, too, have had our suspicions, and have had them removed by explanations which have progressively become less inferential. We, too, see the balance of European power on the point of being immediately disturbed.—The rest is to come.

The other illustration of the way in which the Bonapartes play their quarrels has occurred in the reconstitution of all of us. We really believe that all history scarcely furnishes a parallel so curious as that between Louis Napoleon's breach with the National Assembly and his breach with Austria. Almost every event in either series of transactions is repeated in the other. The quarrel began from the same side, and was moved up in the same way from the smallest proportions to a formidable magnitude. There were the same reconciliations in both cases, the same professions of peaceful intention, the same protracted endeavour to mediation, followed by the same renewal of provocation. In both cases it was deliberately arranged, but the side which was first and quite gratuitously attacked should be guarded at length into taking other aggressive.—After this, the plea of the other disputant was naturally the same. The National Assembly was summoned for annulling against the President, and Austria is to be [illegible] Italy the sovereign of [illegible] What [illegible] should announce that France has the right against Austria.—London Saturday Review.

LATEST from EUROPE!

ARRIVAL OF THE 'NORTH AMERICAN.'

Progress of the War in Italy.

A GREAT BATTLE DAILY EXPECTED.

MOVEMENTS OF THE CONTENDING PARTIES.

THE NEW BRITISH MINISTRY.

QUEBEC, July 4.

The steamship North American, with Liverpool dates to the 22nd, passed Farther Point at 5 30 a. m., yesterday.

The Asia arrived out at 5 o'clock on the morning of the 19th, and the Hungarian at midnight on the 20th.

The North American sailed at eleven o'clock on the morning of the 22nd ult.—The City of Baltimore was to sail three hours later; also the Vanderbilt from Southampton.

The ship Stalwart from New Orleans for Liverpool, was burned at sea. The passengers and crew were saved and brought into Queenston by the Princess Helena. £6,000 in specie was saved.

The intelligence from the seat of war was meagre. Stirring events were expected before the end of June.

No farther fighting had taken place, but the hostile armies were face to face on the Mincio and Adige. A battle was daily expected.

Napoleon and the King of Sardinia were at Brescia, and the Emperor of Austria at Villa Franca.

The retreat of the Austrians had brought them to their reserves on the Mincio and Adige, where they had been joined by great reinforcements. There were probably from 100,000 to 150,000 men who had not yet seen the Allies. The Emperor of Austria was with them. They occupied one of the strongest positions in the world, and had a declined numerical superiority.

An official despatch from Verona says that Count Gyulai, at his own request, had been recalled from his command, which had been given to Count Schlick.

Napoleon and the King of Sardinia entered Brescia on the 18th amid great enthusiasm.

The following despatches show the course of events:—

On the 14th the Sardinian army took up its position on the Mella, near Brescia.

Forces have been despatched to observe the mouths of the Upper Oglio.

Garibaldi advanced on the 15th towards Lenato.

It is asserted that the Austrians are concentrated at Montechiaro, with a rear guard at Castenedolo.

General D'Urban occupied Capriano on the 14th, but abandoned it on the following night

TURIN, June 17th—The Austrians finished on the 16th the evacuation of Montechiaro. Their right wing is said to have gone to Helando, taking the direction of Peschiera. The centre occupies the heights of Castiglione, and the left has gone towards Castelgofferdo.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The official list of the new Cabinet is published; it shows no variation from the one received by the Arabia. Among the appointments which do not figure in the Cabinet are the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Earl of Carlisle; Attorney General, Sir R. Bethel; Solicitor General, Sir H. Keatings. The absence of Mr. Bright's name from the Cabinet gives offence to many ultra-liberals, some of whom say that he was left out at the instigation of the Queen.

COMMERCIAL.

THE FUTURE OF ITALY.

For what is Louis Napoleon contending? To expel the Austrians from Italy, and to avenge Waterloo by setting aside one of the most important arrangements which followed that event—the continuance of Lombardy by treaty to the House of Hapsburg. But what then? It can be no fulfilment of his destiny, as the inheritor of his uncle's name and cocked hat, that he should seek to snatch those Italian possessions from Austria, seeing the elder Napoleon made over to her Venice, in 1797, so changing an independent republic into a mere fief of the imperial crown. Nobody believes that the Emperor Napoleon has consented to drain France of men and means, to impoverish its exchequer and paralyze its trade to imperil his prestige and risk his life, from the chivalrous motive of defending Sardinia and leaving one despot fewer in Italy, or for the barren uncertain results of military glory. What then? Who is to have Lombardy, the richest of Italian kingdoms? Is he to keep it, or give it to Victor Emmanuel, or to Prince Napoleon? And, if to either of the last, are his Italian gifts to stop there? Are the other Royalties of the peninsula to be left untouched, or is there to be a scramble and a division?—The Pope to be left under sufficient vassalage to prevent him doing him any harm, and then the Church be propitiated, while directly through Prince Napoleon, elevated to an Italian throne, and indirectly through Victor Emmanuel, with whom the influence of France will henceforth be paramount, French interests to prevail in Italy.

We have no doubt that some such scheme of ambition has entered the mind of the Emperor Napoleon. The Bonapartes are Corsicans and so Italian, and the House of Savoy has a historical claim for Italy. If the Italian people, overflowing with gratitude to France for deliverance from the oppressors, elect sovereigns more to their mind, who has a right to interfere?

It is no small comfort, where there is so much fitted to perplex and intimidate, that Italy cannot be worse—we had almost written that Italy must be better—and other men than Louis Napoleon have proposed what events have not disposed. A very bold, feeling him in the think of some great fight, where he expected all Italy has upon which to [illegible] change the face of France and of affairs in Europe at one moment. [illegible] with Russia, we suggest an armed [illegible] public [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] permeable by air and water, both indispensable to vegetable life. According to Mr Darwin's mode of expression, they give a kind of under-tillage to the land, performing the same labour ground that the spade does above for the garden, and the plough for arable soil. It is, in consequence, chiefly of the natural operations of worms that fields that have been overspread with lime, burnt marl, or cinders, become in process of time covered by a finely divided soil, fitted for the support of vegetation.—This result, though usually attributed by farmers to the "working down" of these materials, is really due to the action of earth-worms, as may be seen in the innumerable casts of which the initial soil consists. These are obviously produced by the digestive proceedings of the worms, which take into their intestinal canal a large quantity of the soil in which they feed and borrow, and then reject it in the form of the so-called casts. "In this manner," says Mr Darwin, "a field manured with marl, has been covered, in the course of eighty years, with a bed of earth averaging thirteen inches in thickness."

THE "GREAT EASTERN" STEAMER.

The appearance of the mighty ship, on entering upon the lofty deck, affords evidence that busy hands have recently been at work in producing order out of chaos, and carrying out the innumerable details which were necessary to make the Great Eastern a perfect ship. The deck, which used to present a rude succession of huge iron girders, over which people stumbled at every step, is now completely planked from end to end, and a glance along its immense expanse gives the first and best idea of the size of the ship. The different skylights are also in their places, and give a look of finish where all was before incompleteness and confusion. Three masts have been set up, and two funnels, which also go far to "furnish" the deck, and the completed bulwarks all around take away the sense of dizziness and insecurity with which people used to approach the sides of the ship.—One can now look over the side, judge of the vast height of the vessel out of the water, make comparisons between her and anything else that floats upon the Thames, and then enjoy the prospect of the country, both Kent and Essex, now clad in the brightest green of midsummer.

The lower-decks have been planked, and great progress has been made in partitioning them off into this permanent compartments. The grand saloon is in a very forward state, and would be a noble apartment, more like a drawing-room in a princely mansion on shore than the cabin of a ship, were it not for two immense funnels which run up the centre, and inconveniently interrupt the longitudinal sweep of the apartment. On each side elegant cabins are being fitted up, and the same may be said of the other saloons, of which there are, we believe, six in the ship. One of the cabins has been finished, in order that the visitor may judge of what the rest are to be, and a very pleasant notion it gives of what a voyage across the Atlantic will be in such a noble ship as the Great Eastern. This completed department is what is called a family cabin, consisting of bed-room, sitting-room, and dressing-r[illegible] ll of them well ventilated, and possessing a much greater number of conveniences than could be found in a similar suite on shore. The other cabins are also in an exceedingly forward state, and as an immense number of men are kept incessantly at work, there is every prospect of the ship being ready for her trial trip on the appointed 4th of August.

Attempted Murder by a Lunatic.

A YOUNG LADY CHASED BY A NAKED DRUNKARD.

A desperate attempt to murder a young lady, Miss Jane Le Roy, was made on saturday morning last by an Irishman named Patrick Ryan, while under an attack of frenzy produced by excessive alcoholic indulgence.

It seems that Miss Le Roy, who keeps house on Main Street, near the hill, for her brother, Mr. James Le Roy the attorney, was seated in the kitchen on Saturday morning, about 9½ o'clock, when she heard the sound of a person chopping wood in the yard. On looking out of the window, she discovered a man, stripped entirely naked walking towards the door, with a large axe in his hand, and acting in a wild and excited manner. Notwithstanding her alarm at the unwonted sight, she retained her presence of mind enough to lock the front and back doors, and to run up stairs to her bedroom where she locked herself in. Presently she heard the madman—for such she was now convinced he was—breaking in the back door, a job he accomplished in a short time. Once in the house he went around in an aimless manner to spend everything he could lay his hands upon. He rummaged the drawers, overturned chairs, tore papers, and [illegible] out of their places, but apparently without any intention either to rob or destroy. He entered Mr. Le Roy's bed-room and broke open a satchel containing some law papers, which he tore; he pulled out the drawer of the washstand, the contents of which he threw about, and committed other similar follies.

All this time Miss Le Roy sat in her bedroom, trembling with terror, and hoping against hope that he would pass by her door without attempting to enter, but it seems that the lunatic, with a cunning not unusual in such cases was all the while aware of her whereabouts and finally came to her chamber door and demanded admittance.—She not answering, he again called upon her to open the door, or if not he would break it down and kill her when he got inside. The terrified woman kept still, and was almost frantic with terror with the prospect before her. At length the madman's fiendish intention, decided in the chamber door, and sprang into the room, axe in hand. Miss Le Roy nearly knowing what she was about, opened the window and jumped to the ground below, a distance of 20 feet; and ran for the fence, which is some four feet high, and with no agility that is surprising, as she is a small, delicate woman, sprang over it with a bound, and ran across the corn field towards the river, calling for help. The madman had cunning enough left not to follow Miss Le Roy out of the window, but ran down stairs on which he dropped his axe, but on arriving in the yard he procured a club and gave chase to the flying woman. She kept on crossing the railroad embankment at her heels until the girl across another fence, when she fell upon a heap of sand, and her would be murderer upon top of her—the blow he had intended for her falling upon the sand. He repeated [illegible] ejaculations and asked among another, More of her blood, some several men who were in an adjoining field came to her assistance, and [illegible] before [illegible]

It seems that Patrick Ryan, the man in the employ of the family, is an Irishman, a carpenter by trade, of dissipated habits.—He has been building a house on some property owned by Mr. James Bliss, but for the last ten days he has been on a drunken spree, which had given him a fit of delirium tremens.—Brantford (Ill.) News.

The New Postage Law.

(From a Circular of the Postmaster General, addressed to Postmasters.)

All Post Office rates and charges are, from the first of July next, to be made and collected in decimal currency, substituting cents for pence.

All letters posted in Canada, unpaid, for any place within the province, shall be charged seven cents per half oz; but if prepaid, they will pass at five cents, that being the decimal equivalent of the present 3d.

Letters for Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island, 5 cents per half oz, with optional pre-payment.

Letters for the United Kingdom, prepaid 12½ cents, (7½d) per half oz, by Canadian steamers, 17 cents (10d) by Cunard steamers; if not prepaid a fine of 6d sterling will be charged on their arrival at England.

Letters for the United States, (except California and Oregon,) 10 cents (6d) per half oz; to California and Oregon, 15 cents (9d.) (Prepayment we suppose, optional; the circular does not say.)

Letters to all foriegn countries, the same rate as at present, only changing it into cents.

No charge for registering a letter to any place in British North America will be 2 cents, instead of 1d; to the United Kingdom 12½ cents instead of 7½d; to the United States 5 cents instead of 3d. To all other places, the equivalent of the present rate in cents. In all cases, except to B. N. America, letters when registered must have both postage and registration fee prepaid.

Drop or Box Letters, and all minor rates of a like character, to be charged 2 cents for every 1d now charged.

On newspapers, published in Canada, and sent from the office of publication to regular subscribers, the rate will be, if paid quarterly in advance, as follows:—

	Per quarter.
On a daily paper	2s. or 40c.
" tri-weekly	1s. or 20c.
" semi-weekly	8d. or 13c.
" weekly	4d. or 6½c.

These charges can be paid either by the publisher, at the mailing office, or by the subscriber, at the delivering office. When the above rates are not paid in advance, a charge of one cent each number, or threepence for five, will be made.

Transient newspapers must be prepaid by a one cent stamp or they will not be forwarded.

Newspapers from England by the Canadian steamers to pass free; those by the Cunard line, to be charged two cents each on delivery, that being the American transit charge.

Newspapers from the United States are to be charged one cent on delivery.

Exchanges to go free.

Periodical publications, not exceeding three oz. in weight, one cent each; over three oz., four cents. When paid by stamp, periodicals published [illegible]a, weighing over three oz., two cents.

Periodicals devoted exclusively to education, agriculture, temperance, or any other branch of science, to be sent from the office of publication free.

Printed circulars, books, &c., sent from a Canadian office to any place in Canada, B. N. America, or the United States, 1 cent each, over 10z in weight, 1 cent per oz.

Parcels sent by parcel post to any place in Canada, 25 cents per lb; 5 cents additional if registered.

Postage stamps of the respective values of 1, 5, 10, 12½, and 17 cents, have been provided, and will be ready for sale to the public.

The old stamps in the hands of the public will be allowed to pass for a time after the first of July.

The Act declares that any of the following offences shall be considered a misdemeanour:—

To delay, damage, or destroy any parcel sent by the parcel post; to enclose a letter or letters, or writing to serve the purpose of a letter, in a parcel sent by parcel post; to send a letter or letters, or writing to serve the purpose of a letter in a newspaper except in the case of accounts and receipts sent by newspaper publishers to their subscribers, which are allowed to be folded in the papers.

THE COLLEGE QUESTION.

Dr. Ryerson and Mr. Nellis are slow at declaring definitely the true intent and meaning of the Resolutions to which they secured the assent of the Wesleyan Conference. Day by day evidence is accumulated of the fact that neither the Wesleyan Ministers, as a body, nor the laymen of the Wesleyan Church, will concur in any scheme which has for its object the endowment of Sectarian Colleges, as such, or the spoliation of the Provincial University. We are assured that the Resolutions were to a certain extent taken on trust by the Conference, and that the idea of applying themselves to a political agitation, never entered the minds of the Ministers. On an educational subject the views of Dr. Ryerson and Mr. Nellis were considered to be entitled to great weight, and the resolutions passed almost unchallenged. A full exposition of the aims of the Toronto University will, we believe, result in good to the institution, and will remove many of the prejudices which have grown up against it. We are constrained, by want of space, to close our remarks on this subject to-day; but we append a paragraph from a letter which appeared lately in a contemporary print:

"The scholarships are established by the University on behoof of the Province at large, and if Mr. Nellis is unaware of this his ignorance is culpable, for he is both a member of the Senate of Toronto University, and one of its examiners. There are eight Matriculation Scholarships of the value of £20 each, to be competed for in September next; but it is a gross error to imagine that these, or any other of the scholarships, are limited to students of University College who send up eight sufficiently trained candidates, and I do not doubt his ability to train them; there is nothing to prevent their carrying off all the scholarships, collectively with them to Victoria College, and pocketing their stipends there. The only obligation laid on University scholars is that they shall graduate at the University, but they are under no obligation to attend the lectures of University College, if they prefer those of Victoria College, or any other educational institution. I presume Mr. Nellis has nothing to say against the liberality with which the Legislature has endowed the University, with the intention of [illegible] a number of the classes for their pupils, and one of the constituents of the Senate. To suppose an institution, for example, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Agricultural.

HAY-MAKING.

In consequence of the late unseasonable weather, the grass crop will neither be so early or abundant, as was at one time anticipated. The clover plant in some situations is considered this year having been winter killed for want of a sufficient covering of snow. Where the latter was present during the severe frosts in February, the ground is in good heart, and sufficient seed had been sown, the grass will generally be found a fair crop. It is of importance, therefore, to the stock farmer in particular, that the grasses should as far as possible, be converted in the newest and readiest manner into sound and nutritious hay.

The application of the various modern agricultural mechanisms affords the farmer in the way of improved mowing machines, horse rakes, &c., the task of making grass into hay has of late years become more easy, certain and expeditious. The old system was both troublesome and expensive, and the results not unfrequently problematical. Now, by putting into requisition the modern improved implements, when the barometer and other indications denote a settled state of the weather, a large breadth of grass may, in a few days, be safely housed as hay, affording healthy sustenance to live stock during our long and commonly inclement winters.

A very frequent error is committed in allowing the grasses to become too old before cutting. The reasons assigned for this practice is that the largest weight of hay is thereby obtained. Even as to mere weight the practice is very questionable; while the quality has been deteriorated to an extent which few can understand. The true rule for cutting the grasses, whether it be timothy, clovers, or any other kind, is when they are in full bloom. It is when they possess the largest amount of those ingredients which sustain the health and promote the growth of stock. To allow the seed to form and ripen before cutting, and which is often shaken out in the field and lost in the process of curing, a large portion of the starch and sugar becomes changed into woody fibre in the thick cuticle of the stem, a substance containing but very little nourishing power.

In our extremely hot weather, hay, during the process of making, is often exposed too much. Much shaking is injurious, particularly to clover, the leaves of which are liable to fall off. No more shaking and exposure should be permitted than are absolutely required to effect the necessary evaporation, to preventing the hay fermenting too much when put into the rick or barn. Hay is always more or less injured by being allowed to be spread during the night. Our copious dews are as injurious as a slight shower. It ought always to be left either in windrows or cocks; the latter being safer. The practice of salting hay in the mow is to be commended, particularly when it has sustained injury by wet during the process of making.

From all parts of the country the reports of the appearances of the coming crops are very gratifying. The late heavy frost was no doubt damaging to tender vegetation, but the feast expressed of injury to the wheat crop are in most cases unfounded.

Sales of the new wheat crop, harvested in Virginia, were made two weeks ago.

PHONOGRAPHY, OR WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past seven years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, of both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words the labor of six days can be performed by one—one man can do the work of six; the simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for [illegible] any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, or conversations, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Barrow, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

Manufacturers, Mechanics and Inventors.

The Scientific American

TO BE ENLARGED!

A NEW VOLUME—NEW SERIES,

TO COMMENCE ON JULY 24, 1859.

Instead of 416 pages, the yearly volume, Enlarged Series, will contain eight hundred and thirty two pages of valuable reading matter, useful and instructive to all classes.

THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN is published weekly in quarto form, suitable for binding, and the numbers for a single year contains information in regard to new inventions, Machinery, all branches of Manufacturing processes, Agricultural Implements, Engineering, Millwrighting, Iron Manufacture, chemistry; in fact, almost every industrial pursuit receives more or less attention in its columns.

All Patent claims officially published every week, as reported from the Patent Office; and for

INVENTORS AND PATENTEES

It contains information not to be obtained elsewhere, and which no mechanic, inventor or patentee can well do without.

As a Family Journal it has no superior for real practical utility, since in its columns will be found useful practical receipes.

Careful attention will be given, from time to time, to reports of the Metal, Lumber and other Markets.

Every number will contain sixteen pages and forty-eight columns of matter, with several illustrations of patented machines and other engravings, comprising in a single year about

SIX HUNDRED ORIGINAL ENGRAVINGS.

With the Enlarged Series is presented an opportunity to subscribe not likely to occur again for many years. It will be like commencing a new work—Vol. I, No. 1, new Series

Send in your subscriptions without delay, as to begin the new volume—July 2 next.

Terms $2 a Year—$1 for Six Months.

Southern, Western and Canadian money or Post Office stamps taken at par for subscriptions. Canadian subscribers will please to remit twenty-six cents extra on each year's subscription, to pre-pay postage.

A liberal discount to clubs. A prospectus giving full particulars of the inducements for clubs, with specimen copies of the paper, and a pamphlet of information concerning the procuring of Patents may be had gratis, by addressing

CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 20 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can eas

NEUTRALITY.

Hush! 'tis Liberty in labor,
Heaving with the battle throe,
Midst the clash of lance and sabre,
Springs the last appeal of woe;
Stand aloof ye sister nations,
Ye who yet are proud and free,
While we make the red oblations,
To the shrine of Liberty.

By the cruel wrongs you've done us,
Growing weed-like from the past,
By the claims our minds have won us,
In our freedom's cruel fast;
Frown not on us, nor upbraid us,
If we beard the tyrant's guns,
Bursting shackles that degrade us,
Thrusting Moloch from our sons.

Taunted, crushed, despised and goaded,
Dragged in foreign brawls to die,
Shall we groan with fetters loaded,
Till our straining sinews fly?
Shall we die like chosen cattle,
Fattened for a master's board,
Or in manhood's front of battle,
Win our freedom with the sword.

Thus the cry of anguish hovers,
O'er each soft Italian plain,
Spreading till the war-cloud covers
Every vine and patch of grain.
Out from fields of buried glory
Shadows woke by armed heel,
Come to share the vintage glory,
Reap the sheaves of sterile steel.

Sterile! God of Mercy harken
To a suffering people's prayer;
Let not Hope's bright morning darken,
Once again into despair!
The lovely form, with hands uplifted,
That calls upon her sons to save,
Was not by Heaven with beauty gifted
To perish in a harlot's grave.

Listen to the nations arming!
Is it for the right or wrong
That those angry sounds alarming
Sweep the continent along?
Is that the distant thunder
And the restless armies tread,
Shake historic graves asunder
With a warning from the dead.

Is it but a masked ambition
Playing with a nation's trust,
Or a despot coalition
Trampling freedom in the dust?
If it be the might of honor
Raising up a prostrate land,
Branded be he who upon her
Lifts the renegrado hand.

Dark and gloomy is the present;
God knows but the slender moon
May, from slightly tinted crescent
Reach the blood-red fullness soon.
So with thunderbolts around her,
Let the Mother of the Free,
Calmly rest till called to sound her
Ancient notes of victory.

THE BACHELOR BEAU.

CHAPTER I.

"I can no longer struggle against the current of misfortune," exclaimed Mr. Whiting, a small merchant, who had by the pressure of hard times become somewhat involved; "I am ruined!"

"Nay, my husband, do not be distressed. Worse calamities than this might happened, and we will make the best of it."

"But wife, I must fail; I cannot sustain myself another day."

"You have done all you can to avert the misfortune, and if it must come, let us not repine, but bear it like Christians."

"I will try to keep calm; but it seems hard, after weathering the worst of the storm, to be wrecked inside of the land."

"Perhaps your creditors will give you more time," suggested Mrs. Whiting.

"I cannot hope it; the note which comes due to-morrow, and which I am utterly unable to pay, is in the hands of my bitterest enemy."

"He will not distress you."

"I know him well. He is a villian!"

"Whom do you mean?"

"Bacher."

"God help us, if he is your creditor."

"As near as I can learn, he bought the note on purpose to perplex me, and perhaps to obtain his revenge."

"Why is he so bitter against you?"

"Because I exposed a swindling operation in which he was engaged."

"How much is the note, father?" asked a beautiful, hazel-eyed girl, who had not before spoken, but who had been listening with intense interest to the conversation between her father and mother.

"Three thousand dollars, Sarah, replied Mr. Whiting, fixing a glance of anxiety upon the fair girl.

"Can't you borrow it, father?"

"Alas! my child, my credit is very much impaired. My notes have been too think in State Street for me to borrow without paying exorbitant interest; and that I think would wrong my creditors in case any thing should happen."

"It is not so dreadful to fail, is it, father?"

"It would be ruinous to me, my child. If I could pay this note to-morrow, I could get along very well. I should not have been embarrassed, had it not been for the failure of Jones. But I suppose it must be, and we must content ourselves to live a little more closely than we have been accustomed to do."

Sarah asked no more questions, and though the conversation was continued by her father and mother, she seemed to pay no attention to it. She appeared to be sinking deeply over something.

As the evening advanced, John Barnet, a clerk who had for some months been attentive to Sarah, and who, report said, was a favored suitor, made his accustomed evening visit. Every body said that John Barnet was a fine young man, and every one thereby of an beautiful and estimable a wife as Sarah Whiting would undoubtedly make him.

If there is any thing in smiles and gentle words, the affection of the young clerk was warmly reciprocated by Sarah. They were not engaged however, though he called at Mr. Whiting's house from four to seven evenings in a week.

Mr. Whiting and his wife retired at an early hour in the evening, leaving the lovers "to have it out."

As usual, John Barnet begged her to make him happy by promising to be his forever. To his utter suprise and consternation, she told him she could never be his wife, and entreated him to think no more about her. Of course, the lover pressed her for an explanation of this sudden and remarkable change in her manner towards him. But she could not even do this, and John took his leave, feeling that he had not another friend in the world.

CHAPTER II.

Sarah Whiting had another suitor in the person of a wealthy and eccentric old bachelor, who, after withstanding the assaults of thousands of bright eyes and bewitching smiles, had laid his heart at the feet of our beautiful heroine. We don't blame the old fellow for falling in love with her, any more than we blame Sarah for laughing at him when he threw himself at her feet and "popped the question."

Mr. Landyke Somerset was only about forty, so that, if Sarah had been less cruel, it would not have been exactly "May and December," but about June and November. He loved her with all the fervor which the march of time had left in his heart, and was actually disconsolate when she told him 'no.'

Mr. Landyke Somerset was not an ill-looking man, though he was an old bachelor. True his hair was not as black and glossy as it had been twenty years before; there was an occasional iron-gray hair, which looked a little suspicious; yet, when he began to make his court to the divinity of his dreams, even these suddenly disappeared, and people were malicious enough to say it was through the influence of a certain compound applied by the barber. True, also, there was now and then a wrinkle in his face, which some young ladies affect to dislike. But what of all these things? Old age is honorable, and the iron-gray hairs and the wrinkles did not in the least mar the kindly expression of his phiz.

He was a very clever fellow, and though the merry little Sarah Whiting could not help laughing when he "popped the question" to her, she would very willingly have had just such an uncle, or something of that sort. In short she liked him, but she didn't love him.

Mr. Landyke Somerset was a firm believer in the ancient verity, that "faint heart ne'er won fair lady," and he determined not to faint or give up the chase till he had bagged the game, or had seen her the wife of another. Consequently he held out all the inducements in his power to engage her heart in his favor.

He was not what young ladies call an "old fool," for he had sense enough to feel that he should never be able to gain the victory on the strength of his physical attributes—his personal beauty. But he was an amiable man at heart, and trusted solely to the influence of his moral and mental qualities for success. They had thus far failed him though he still persevered.

Mr. Whiting readily understanding what these attentions meant, did all in his power to favor this suit; for he was an old fashioned man, and placed more confidence in the power of a good heart and plenty of money to make his daughter happy, than he did in the more common attributes of youth and good looks, even though the possessor of the first-named commodities had passed the meridian of life.

But Sarah had a mind of her own in these matters, and though she appreciated her kind father's motives, she could not think of throwing herself away on a man of forty, even if he was an angel.

It was only the afternoon of the day preceding the conversation we have recorded, that Mr. Somerset had paid her a visit, and renewed his protestations of love to her. She had told him for the twentieth time, "no."

When she heard her father relate the particulars of his embarrassment, the image of Mr. Somerset had involuntarily presented itself to her mind. He was abundantly able to assist them in this emergency, and for the love he bore her perhaps he would.

But then if she applied to him, and he afforded the necessary aid, she would be under an obligation to him, which she might find it very inconvenient to discharge.

Ruin stared her father in the face. He had said it was ruin and she was sure it was. What right had she to be selfish or over nice, when, perhaps she had it in her power to avert the dreadful calamity? Her father was all in all to her; and though some girls are so sentimental as to sacrifice father, mother, home, friends, for a lover, she would sacrifice a dozen lovers for her father alone, to-say nothing of her mother, who was at least worth two dozen more.

Let not the reader suppose the pretty Sarah did not love him upon whom she had smiled—she did; but her bump of veneration was bigger than that other bump on the back of her head.

Her resolution was formed, and about eleven o'clock the next day, she put on her bonnet, and walked up to the Revere House where Mr. Somerset boarded.

CHAPTER III.

Mr. Landyke Somerset was a nabob, and retained a private parlour, to which the obsequious servant conducted Sarah Whiting. Of course the bachelor was reasonably astonished at this visit.

"Indeed, Miss Whiting, I am delighted to see you," exclaimed he, with rapturous enthusiasm.

"I know you would be, and that's the reason I came," laughed Sarah, and at the same time she blushed at her remark that Mr. Landyke Somerset had chided himself in a rapture of delight.

"Ah, my dear Miss Whiting, you are and always so kind to me as you are to-day."

"But I always will be thereafter," and Sarah smiled, though her heart beat like the bounding of a race horse."

"Ah, you are so good, and so pretty, too."

"I will save you the trouble of all these useless adulations by saying that I have come to accept your oft-repeated proposal."

"Indeed!" and the bachelor was taken "all aback;" he could hardly believe the evidence of his own senses.

"What, sir! Do you recede from your offer?" said Sarah, laughing with all her might—a very convenient cloak for young ladies sometimes.

"Capital joke, eh?" and the bachelor laughed too.

"No joke, sir; I am in earnest."

Sarah looked as sober as the matron of an orphan asylum.

"Nay, nay, my pretty Sarah, do not make sport of me."

"I will give you my promise in writing, with my signature, if you desire it."

"Is it possible that you mean so? said the doubtful Mr. Somerset.

"Take my hand."

The bachelor took it, pressed it to his lips, and began to think himself the happiest fellow in the world.

"I am yours, Mr. Somerset."

"Bless you Sarah!"

"On o ne condition."

"Name it."

Sarah recounted the story of her father's embarrassment.

"Fill me out a check for three thousand dollars, and I promise to become your wife within one year."

Mr. Landyke Somerset mused. He appeared to be in doubt. He was a high-souled man, and the idea of buying the hand of his wife was to the last degree repugnant to him.

"You hesitate, sir; I know you do not love me," said Sarah, with apparent pique.

"On my soul, I do! I agree; here is the check," replied Mr. Somerset, as he seated himself at the table and drew the check.

"Now enclose it in a note for my father saying you learned his trouble from a mutual friend, and then beg the privilege of loaning him the amount of the check."

"And you sacrifice yourself to your father, my fair Sarah!" said the bachelor, as he sealed the note.

"I do."

"You are an angel!"

"Nay, I must go now"

The check did the business, and Mr. Whiting was as happy as ever he was in his life Bacher could not sleep that night because he had been foiled in his revenge.

In the evening Mr. Somerset called at the house to see his future bride. She treated him kindly, and permitted him to sit by her side, hold her work basket, and pick up her thimble when she dropped it—which was glory enough for an evening, to one as moderate in his wishes as the bachelor beau of our heroine.

But about eight o'clock, to Sarah's utter consternation, John Barnet paid his usual visit. The poor clerk was sadly distressed, as well he might be, and had called to desire an explanation of the cool manner in which he had been dismissed.

The presence of Mr. Somerset was all the explanation he desired. He was uneasy; he could not join in the conversation and aware that he was making himself disagreeable to the party, he determined to take his leave; but how could he leave her. He knew Mr. Somerset to be one of the best men in the world, and he requested an interview with him on the spot.

The worthy bachelor kindly consented to walk down the street a short distance with him, and John Barnet told him the whole story; how he loved Sarah, and how he had every reason to believe that Sarah loved him. He was sure that some unfair advantage had been taken, and he wanted the matter explained.

Come back to the house young man, and I will give you all the satisfaction you desire."

John consented.

A few minutes sufficed to explain to Mr. Whiting and the discarded lover the nature of the sacrifice which the devoted Sarah had made for her father's sake.

"Bless you, my child!" exclaimed the merchant, his eyes filled with tears of love, as he tenderly embraced his noble-hearted daughter.

"You understand it now, don't you, Mr. Barnet?" said the bachelor, with a good-natured smile.

"I do, indeed," replied John, sorrowfully "she is a noble girl, and I shall never cease to love her though she can never be mine."

Sarah cast a sad glance at him, and her eyes filled with tears. She never knew till that moment how much she loved the poor clerk. But it was all over now—the bright dreams of love had passed away, and she could never be happy again.

"What, Sarah! do you recede from your promise?" asked Mr. Somerset.

"Nay, I do not. Farewell John! farewell forever!" and the poor girl sobbed convulsively.

"Farewell, Sarah!" and the clerk seized his hat and rushed towards the door.

"Hallo! stop, young man!" exclaimed Mr. Somerset; "don't go off mad. Give me your hand."

The bachelor took the clerk's hand.

"You are a good fellow; I honor you. Your hand, Sarah," and Mr. Somerset took the little white hand of the weeping maiden and placed it in that of John Barnet. "Be happy!"

"What do mean sir?" asked Sarah, bewildered at the actions of the bachelor.

"Mean! You love him, don't you?"

"With all my soul?"

"And you do not love me?"

Sarah began to understand.

"I like you."

"You are his; be happy! You did not for a moment suppose I could be so mean as to take advantage of such a noble act of self-sacrifice as you performed to-day? No! I love you, but I will not make you miserable."

Poor Sarah! How happy she was, and how she pitied poor Mr. Somerset, who loved her so much! She felt that, if the old lover soon John Barnet, she would have been glad to become his wife, iron gray and wrinkles to the contrary notwithstanding—he was such a dear good soul!

"Be happy! and that isn't all; when I die you shall have half my fortune."

The bachelor kept his word, and though he didn't die of a broken heart, he did not live many years; yet when he did die, the hand of a woman—of one true and loving a woman as ever made home a paradise—smoothed his dying pillow, and closed his eyes in their last sleep; and there were sincere mourners over his bier.

Poor Mr. Landyke Somerset! though he found not a wife in Sarah Whiting, he found a true friend.

The Mothers of Great Men.

The only two satisfactory instances given by Mrs. Ellis of a mother whose son was really great, and who had a direct and traceable influence on the greatness, are the instances of the mother of St. Augustine and the mother of Napoleon. Not only was St. Augustine a very remarkable man and Monica a very remarkable woman, but the son owed to the mother the direction of his thoughts, the purpose of his life, and the source of his enjoyment. In those moments when St. Augustine was conscious that he had reached the highest pitch of spiritual exultation, he was also conscious that his mother soared as high as he did.—It would be an abuse of language to term Monica a great woman in the same way that we term St. Augustine a great man, for he added to the piety and sublime feeling of his mother a remarkable degree of literary power and a great range of thought. We must also judge of all greatness by the test of success; and St. Augustine is principally to be called great because he, as a matter of fact, gave so much of its colour to western Christianity. But the basis of his thoughts and feelings, his mode of viewing the relations between himself, God, and the world, had been derived from his mother.

In a similar way we can trace a clear affinity between the character and mental constitution of Napoleon and those of his mother. There was the same stubbornness, the same keenness of thought, the same meanness in certain acts of common life, the same resolute determination to enforce the burden of their ascendancy on all around them. There was in the manner a Corsican fineness which degenerated into the lying of the son—the grandest liar, probably, the world has ever seen. Napoleon, himself, attributed many of his notions of government to the family system in which he had been brought up; on the plan of helping, and snubbing, and bullying his brothers, according to the fancies or the exigencies of the moment, was founded on traditions that dated from his infancy.—In fact, the whole enquiry as to the influence of mothers on sons, as conducted by Mrs Ellis, is utterly purposeless. For what is the exact question that is to be solved? That mothers exercise an influence over their sons is obvious; but there is no reason to suppose that the qualities which make men great are dependent on this influence than any other set of qualities. If Mrs Ellis's book proves anything, it proves that there is no rule whatever on the subject and no lesson whatever to be learnt from it. It does not need an octavo volume to establish that a man of extraordinary gifts is likely to render those gifts more profitable to himself and others if he has a very pious, wise, strict, loving, charming woman to guide him in infancy and youth. But no one can say that great men have, as a rule, had such great fortune. Greatness depends on qualities that are entirely personal to the individual, which defy analysis, and cannot be traced to any distinct source. They are effected in their development by an endless variety of circumstances, and a most important circumstance is the sort of mother who has the control of them in their earliest stage. But they are quite independent of her. Jerome and Joseph Bonaparte had the same origin as Napoleon. What made him great was that which he had besides what they had; and the ultimate result of all inquiries of this sort is to convince us that it is hopeless to ask why one individual differs from another. Physical science is utterly at a loss to account for this difference. There is no perceptible variation in the size or quality of the brain, or of the nervous system, that will in the least account for the superior activity of the mind, or of the greater firmness of the will.—London Saturday Review.

Who's got the Donkey?

John Jones had a miserable life of it. He worked hard but was always in want, and he considered it lucky if the day's expenditure did not exceed the days income. It was a constant struggle to make the ends meet, and the outgoing end seemed to be for ever lengthening, while the incoming end constantly contracting. His necessities compelled him to buy on credit, and sell for ready money so he always bought in the dear market; and, sold in the cheap. His profits were small and every day grew less; but his wants were great, and daily became greater. He was no scholar, and kept no accounts; he was no social or political economist, and knew nothing of the theory of making money, or the art of saving it. He had a little practical knowledge of the principle of exchange, and knew that the price of the coals bought yesterday, must be paid by the money realised by the sales of to-day; and that if he took an extra glass of whiskey, in addition to his usual allowance, his wife and family would be restricted to a smaller quantity of food, or obliged to contract an additional amount of debt.

It was no use to talk of lessening their expenditure, because it was necessary to eat and drink; and as his credit, from the irregularity of his payments, was always getting low, and as he had made a practice of pleading the benefit of the Tipping Act when pressed for unpaid accounts, no publican would give him quarter on trust, so that the only potables beside ready-money frequently found both inside or dividing the household expenses.

It was in these circumstances that John first came under our notice. He might have been seen every day harnessed to a small cart with his two ragged, ill-conditioned sons pushing behind, calling as loudly as they could bawl, "Coals! cheap coals!" An old hat without the rim, an old coat minus a sleeve, a pair of tattered smalls clothes without buttons, and, as Paddy would say, footless stockings without the legs, completed his dress. His children were covered with about equal proportions of dirt and rags, and his wife might have sat for the picture of "Patience on a monument, smiling at Grief. Life to him hitherto, had been all downhill; and he appeared to have reached the lowest point to which he could possibly fall, when an incident gave his thoughts and feelings a different direction, and he changed the whole course of his life.

In the street where he lived, was occasionally opened a small wooden theatre, where for the small charge of a penny, the youth of the vicinity were amused with scenic representations, and instructed in all the various practices of successful crime.—To the dismay of many, and the joy of a few the theatre was removed, and a small Christian church erected in its place. John had never frequented the theatre, because he considered a glass of whiskey better worth the money than a foolish song; but his boys, when they could pick up a penny, thought it well-spent in seeing the "Life and Adventures of Jack Sheppard." Now, however, that admission to the church cost nothing, and as his money was all spent, and his own home no way attractive, John thought as he looked at the door, that it was well heated, and comfortably seated, and that he could not do better than get into a corner and see what was going on. The person that was in the desk, was speaking of the condition of the poor, and in a few minutes John held down his head, for he thought he was speaking to him. He listened, however, and heard his own state so well-described, his feelings so truly pictured, his wants so accurately stated, and his miseries so affectionately mentioned, that he wondered trembled and wept. No one before had even taken any interest in him; but here a perfect stranger knew every circumstance of his life, and seemed to sympathize in all his sufferings.

The next night, John was at the church-door before it was opened; but at length his stranger-friend made his appearance.

The subject of discourse was Christ's love to His people, and his theme was more attractive than the last. John, for the first time, heard that the Son of God descended from heaven, became "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," and offered himself up a sacrifice for the sins of mankind. Night after night, when the church was opened, John was to be seen stealing into a remote corner, quietly and attentively listening to the service, and lingering till the last of the assembly were leaving the church.

He felt almost ashamed of this new attraction; church-going had appeared to him to be a sort of privilege of the rich or well-dressed, and he had no idea that a church could belong peculiarly to the poor. However, new light was shed into his mind; he began to see the folly of his previous life, and resolved to try if virtue's ways were indeed ways of pleasantness and peace.—The daily indulgence in whisky was withheld, and the pence thereby saved, were applied to the payment of old debts; these gradually diminished, and he was soon enabled to become a ready-money buyer, and could afford to sell on credit. Trade and profits increased, and he found it necessary to increase his locomotive power, and to place a donkey in his cart, instead of his sons and himself.

Profane Swearing.

Rev. C. H. Chapin, the celebrated Universalist preacher, thus alludes to profane swearing in one of his discourses on the Lord's prayer:—"If we would use the prayer sincerely, we must hallow God's name on our lips. It will never be a light word there. It will never drop out in jest or ring in blasphemy. I wish to touch this point earnestly. I would speak strongly against the common sin of profaneness.—Are there any before me who are accustomed to use God's name as an expletive, and to brandy it as a by-word? Who employ it in all kinds of conversation, and throw it about in every place? Perhaps in their hearts, they consider this an accomplishment! think it manly and brave to swear! Let me say then, that profaneness is a brutal vice. He who indulges in it is no gentleman. I care not what his stamp may be in society. I care not what clothes he wears, or what culture he boasts. Despite all his refinement, the light and habitual taking of God's name, betrays a coarse nature, and a brutal will. Nay, he tacitly admits that it is ungentlemanly. He rests nine oaths in the presence of ladies; and he who fears to rush into the chancery of heaven and swear by the Majesty there, is decently observant in the drawing-room and the parlour. But, again, Profaneness is an unmanly and silly vice. It is certainly not a grace in conversation, and it adds no strength to it. There is no organic symmetry in the narrative that is ingrained with oaths; and the blasphemy that bolsters an opinion does not make it any more correct. Our mother English has variety enough to make a story sparkeble, and to give wit; it has toughness enough and vehemence enough to furnish sinews for a debate and to drive home conviction, without degrading the holy epithets of Jehovah. Nay, the use of these explatives, argues a limited range of ideas, and a consciousness of being on the wrong side. And, if we can find no other phrases through which to vent our choking passion, we had better suppress that passion. And, again, Profaneness is a mean vice. According to general definition he who repays kindness with contempt, he who shames his friend and benefactor, is deemed pitiful and wretched. And yet oh profane man! whose name is it you handle so lightly? Is it that of your best Benefactor? Yet, friend Hood would bid you treat the venerable names of your earthly parents harlots about in scoffs and jests, abuse without compunction, without thought the name of your heavenly father! Finally Profaneness is an awful vice. Once more I ask, whose name is it you so slightly use? The name of God! have you ever pondered its meaning? Have you ever thought what it is that you mingle thus with your passion and your wit? It is the name of Him whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain.

"TOOLE A WEE."

Not many years ago there lived in the south of Scotland a somewhat eccentric clergyman who had been preaching most vigorously on the impropriety of profane swearing, and denouncing the rather common habit of using one of Satan's names in ordinary conversation. On the Monday he set out to visit a few of his people. Just as he was entering a neighboring village, he overtook an old woman, who was carrying home a young pig which she meant to rear. The old woman's strength and patience both became exhausted, and waxing wroth she exclaimed, "Deevil choke ye, beast!" The minister was passing at the moment, but he simply looked, heaved a sigh, and went on his way. On reaching the further end of the village, he found another old woman assiduously attempting to induce a flock of ducklings to enter in at a stable door. The old dame was completely baffled; and as she stood wiping her face with her apron, the minister heard her give vent to her spleen in these words—"Deevil tak' ye, beasts!" He evidently thought this was a great deal to much, and stepping forward he thus accosted her—"Ay, ay, just thole a wee, my leddy; he's busy at the ither end o' the toon chokin' a soo; but he'll be your way the noo, I'se warrant ye—just thole a wee."

THE DUKE AND THE BUTTON MAKER.

In the middle of the battle of Waterloo; the Duke saw a man in plain clothes riding about on a cab horse in the thickest fire.—During a temporary lull the Duke beckoned to him, and he rode over. He asked him who he was—what business he had there? He replied he was an Englishman, accidently at Brussels; that he had never seen a fight, and he wanted to see one.—The duke told him that he was in instant danger of his life; he said, "Not more than your Grace; and they parted. But every now and then he saw the cob man riding about in the smoke, and at last, having nobody to send to a regiment, he again beckoned to this little fellow, and told him to go up to that regiment and order them to charge, giving him some mark of authority the colonel would recognise. Away he galloped, and in a few minutes the Duke saw his order obeyed. The Duke asked him for his card, and found in the evening, when the card fell out of his sash, that he lived at Birmingham, and was a button manufacturer. When at Birmingham, the Duke inquired of the firm, and found that he was their traveller, and then in Ireland. When he returned, at the Duke's request, he called on him in London. The Duke was happy to see him, and he said he had a vacancy in the Mint at £800 a-year. The little cob man said it would be exactly the thing, and the Duke installed him.—Life of Haydon, the Painter.

Odds and Ends.

Bassompiere, the French Ambassador to Spain, was relating to Henry IV. the particulars of his entry into Madrid.

"I was mounted," he said "on the smallest mule in the world.

"Ah!" exclaimed the King, "what an amusing sight! An ass upon a mule!"

"Very good, Sire," retorted Bassompiere, "I was your Majesty's representative."

"Drawing what?"

"Drawing their breath, of course?"

—"Pa," said a little girl to her father one day, "let me have some beer, won't you?"

"Beer, my child, what do you want with beer?"

"Why I want to dye some ribbons with it. Ma says that's what makes your nose so red, and that's just the colour I want for my ribbons."

—"Pray Doctor, what is the difference between the puseyism they talk so much about and puppeyism?"

"Puppyism, sir, is founded on dogmatism, and puseyism on the catechism."

—"What is the height of the triumphal arch erected in Glasgow for the reception of the Queen," was asked a witty and eccentric character named Hawkey.

"The height of d—d nonsense," was the quiet reply.

—The man who has no music in his soul when last seen was listening to a boy filing the teeth of a saw. He seemed highly delighted.

—An old bachelor being told that "love was like the ivy, the older you grow the more it will cling to you," replied that it was a poor rule that wouldn't work both ways, and put it thus "the closer she clings to you the more you are raised."—Heartless wretch!

Characteristics of French and Austrian soldiers.

A French military historian, in discussing the qualifications of Polish troops, remarks that even their propensity to gasconade was a good soldierly trait, for that by their open boasting they took upon themselves obligations which they were compelled to redeem in the field, and which they generally did redeem in a very complete and honorable fashion. The historiographer now attached to the French head-quarters may apply this observation with some justice to his countrymen. The predictions with which they entered on the Italian campaign were exceedingly remarkable. It was said that the whole war would be the affair of a month, that the French troops would drive the Austrians before them from one end of Lombardy to the other, and that the army would return covered with glory to its native land in the course of the next few weeks. In these assertions there was naturally a little extravagance, but it is a very notable circumstance that every French soldier did really believe in the absolute superiority of the French arms. Strange to say, the impression was shared in some degree by the Austrians also, for all that was said on their side was, that by retiring to their fortresses they might perhaps erect a barrier against which the tide of French valor would beat in vain. These were the tactics advocated by one party, and perhaps the wisest, of Austrian strategists. Yet to the eyes of Europe there was no sufficient warrant for this disparity of confidence. The Austrian army was no contemptible force. Its numerical strength was enormous, the excellence of its ingredients unquestionable, and the scientific proficiency of its officers beyond all doubt. Why should the French assume with such extraordinary decision, that no Austrian troops could stand against them in the field? That question might perhaps be hard to answer; but it is, at any rate, plain that the event up to the present hour has justified the sentiments they expressed. They have beaten the Austrians at every point exactly as they prophesied. They have done no less than they said. They went into battle with what Englishmen might consider an awkward obligation, but they have well discharged it. They stood to win on rather onerous terms; for if they won it was no more than they had pledged themselves to do, and if they lost, their success and credit went together. However, they have been as good as their word, and, if their undertakings were large, their performance has been in due proportion.

It is, indeed impossible to read of the French army, as described and characterized by our correspondent, without feelings of admiration. We are not speaking merely of its valor in the field, for the Piedmontese and Austrians are brave also, but of the perfection to which French soldiers appear to carry every military excellence.—They adapt themselves to circumstances with a facility quite marvellous. They embark at one port and are landed at another without the least embarrassment or confusion; they take their places in a railway train as if they had learnt the manœuvre on parade—which perhaps they did; and when they are seen at the close of a long march their carriage is as sprightly and as elastic as if they had just quitted their barracks. Look, again, at their instinctive faculties of organization. An army of more than 100,000 men has been moved, quartered, camped, and fed with so little demand upon the resources of Sardinia itself that the prices of provisions in that country were at first hardly raised. The rations of the French troops were brought from French towns, stored in French Magazines, and prepared by French hands without so much as the aid of a Piedmontese butcher or a Piedmontese oven. All that immense host has been self supporting. It is supplied with as much regularity as the population of Paris, and is manœuvred with as much accuracy as a division in the Camp de Mars. We are not forgetting the advantages of Louis Napoleon's position. Hitherto he has been in a friendly country, with his own broad territories as the base of his operations; he has been assisted by a brave army of Sardinians, and he can rely on the sympathies of an inflammable population. Our correspondent, indeed, trace the disasters of the Austrians in no small degree to the ignorance in which they were kept by the dogged and hostile silence of the Italian peasantry. Still for all this the organization of the French army is wonderful; more so indeed than its ascendancy in the field. The men are born soldiers, there is no denying it. It is the old Gallic race all over, with the equipments and developments of a modern age.

Singular in the extreme it is that generations upon generations should have wrought such little change, and that not only the French but the Austrians should be so precisely what they always were. One can hardly comprehend the peculiar Austrian faculty of being beaten and not conquered, and yet we may perhaps see it developed. General Gyulai's troops seem to be prepared for defeats as other soldiers are for victories; in fact, it is a victory which in their case, would be literally a "reverse."—Still they have not been disheartened.—They retire from point to point before the advance of the allies, but whenever they have fought it has been with undiminished obstinance. The latest battles, indeed have been fought the hardest, and we may see some harder than these.

One half of the defeats already suffered by the Austrians in this campaign would, if suffered by the French, probably have demoralized their army. The Austrians, in all likelihood, will fight their next battle with as much obstinacy as ever—so striking is the difference between race and race. In point of fact, the French have not yet been tried on their weakest point. What the Roman General said of the old Gauls is true of their modern representatives.—They are almost irresistable in their first rant, and so long as their course is unchecked, but if the impetuosity of their attack is encountered by any vexatious obstacle they are liable to discouragement and despondency. Of course, civilization and discipline have gone far to remove this national defect, but the characteristic survives still and those best acquainted with French soldiers have doubted wether the army would retain its confidence or its spirits amid the languid and protracted operations of a succession of sieges. Perhaps the Emperor will take measures to escape this contingency. He is certainly displaying considerable military skill, and he is perfectly acquainted with all the qualities of his troops. Perhaps, too, the new French artillery may impart a character to siege operations never witnessed before. It would be a mistake, however, to regard the campaign as absolutely decided. The tenacity of the Austrian troops is extraordinary, and in war, the whole aspect of affairs may be altered by the accidents of a week. If there is any predominant reflection suggested by the spectacle before us, it is that of bitter regret at so sad a loss of brave men and by such horrible sufferings as our correspondent describes. We forget even the triumphs of the battle-field and the exultation of a liberated people as the dreadful scenes of a military hospital are presented to our eyes. Here are two great nations each endowed with faculties and proficiencies of its own, converting their talents into the means of mutual slaughter and ruin. What makes it worse, too, is that the results will survive the process. Not only will money be squandered, lives lost, and progress forgotten, but armies will be infected with the contagion of war, and the fever of military glory. War feeds itself in more senses than one. It begets good soldiers, and good soldiers are inclined to war. Not the least of the evils attending the present contest may be this,—that it will unteach the population of Europe the lessons which they have learnt from two generations of almost unbroken peace, and well, therefore, may all thinking men pray that so pernicious a strife may be terminated as speedily as possible.

NEW ADVERTISMENTS.

By-Law No.—J. Edwards.
Notice—G. E. Boulton.
The Weekly Globe.
For Sale—Whyte, Hamilton & Co.

To Our Subscribers.

The new Postage Law has came into operation. It was formerly our intention to send the paper free of postage, but there are difficulties connected with this system which render it impracticable. We have since came to the conclusion to reduce the terms of subscription; consequently on and after the 1st day of August next the Examiner will be furnished to subscribers at the extremely low rate of $1.50 per annum, if paid in advance. If not so paid $2 will be charged. This reduction has been made with a view to increase our already large County circulation, and to encourage the system of advance payments.

Subscribers who have formerly received the Examiner at the Peterboro' post office may have it left by our paper-carrier at their office or residence, if within the Corporation; if outside the Town limits, subscribers will be required to call at the office of publication.

Separation from the County.

As will be seen by our Town Council report a By-law to provide for the separation of this Town from the jurisdiction of these United Counties has been read a second time, and will be submitted for approval by the rate-payers of the Town. A committee appointed to investigate the matter report very favorable to a separation. The report shows that the Town pays at present one-sixth of the whole County tax. The report also shews that if separated the saving to the Town would be something like $2,254 or 1s. in the £ annually. We do not like the manner of jumping into such movements hurriedly, as it is a subject which requires mature consideration, but if the estimate of the gentlemen appointed to investigate the proposal be correct, then we say the quicker a separation takes place the better. Every penny of a reduction in our taxes should be hailed with cheerfulness, and every scheme to reduce them will meet our approval and ensure the sanction of the rate-payers. The new Municipal Law provides that Towns have the privilege of withdrawing from the County in which they may be situated, and a connection is merely optional with the rate-payers themselves. If, as seems to be the case of Peterboro', the connection proves to be detrimental to the interests of the Town, a separation can at once be effected without reference to Parliament.

The Twelfth in Peterboro'.

Tuesday last being the anniversary of the Battle of the Boyne, the Lodges in Town after transacting their usual business on the 12th, at ten o'clock the lodges headed by the Peterborough Rifle Band, left for the grove in front of the Court House where they were soon joined by several of the Lodges of the Peterboro District; at noon they were put into ranks by George Johnston, Marshal of the day, when they marched to the Port Hope and Peterboro' Railway Depot, to meet the visiting brethren from the Districts of Hope, Port Hope, Cavan and Emily.

On the arrival of the Cars, the procession was formed and marched through several of the principal streets, also visiting Ashburnham.

Refreshments were served at the grove in front of the Court House, after the tables was cleared, the County Master, Edwin Poole, Esq., was called to the chair, after a few remarks he called on the Rev. Mr. Lanton, who delivered an eloquent address, Dr. Irons, was the next called upon, the Rev. Mr. Short of Port Hope, wound up the proceedings with a very appropriate address, after which the Masters of the Lodges took up a collection in aid of the orphans home; the visiting Brethren were then escorted to the Railway Depot, where three cheers were given for the "Queen," and three for the "Worshipful Grand Master." The Lodges going to their several rooms, closed the proceedings of the day. The Town was very quiet throughout the evening.

The Review professes respect for the "craft." We cannot believe him sincere until he abides by its rules. When a contemporary is charged with falsehood, and it fails to meet such charge fairly, an insult is at once offered, and a total disrespect for the rules of the craft shewn. "Beating the bush" won't do, Thomas.

THE HAY HARVEST has commenced and many fields in the County have been cut within the past week. The yield is generally poor, owing no doubt to the late frosts.

The thermometer stands 86 degrees in the shade.

"ANOTHER GREAT BATTLE has been fought, and the allies are again masters of the field. The scene of this combat was Salferino; the total killed and wounded number about 30,000; four Generals are reported wounded, and one killed; the battle lasted 12 hours, and over 200,000 men were engaged; the favorite corps, the Zouaves and the Chasseurs of Algeria, were cut up fearfully. Prussia has issued a manifesto in which she states that if the allied army threatens the least encroachment on German interests, she will feel herself called upon to take up arms.—England still holds her neutrality, although extensive war preparations are going on.

ATTEMPTED ROBBERY—On Tuesday evening last an attempt was made forcibly to enter the store of W. Clurton, George Street. The depredators contrived to enter the cellar by removing the bars over the window, and having gained their way to the door leading from the cellar to the hall, they burst it open. They then tried the door leading from the hall to the store but as it was well secured by a heavy bar inside they were unable to proceed further. The rascals were evidently in quest of money, as nothing is missed from the cellar although there is a large quantity of groceries always kept there.

The 100th Regiment.

The following letter from an officer in the 100th has been handed to us for publication:—

GIBRALTAR, May 29, 1859.

To J. W. Smyth, Keene, C. W.

Dear Brother and Sister: I embrace this opportunity of throwing together a few sentences to let you know where I am and how I am getting along. I am at present, as you perceive, in famed Gibraltar, enjoying myself well and in excellent health—thank God for the blessing. We departed from Aldershot, England, on the 7th inst., and embarked from Portsmouth on board the steamer Urgent bound for this place, and arrived here on the 13th; we had a quick and pleasant voyage. There were but six companies came at the time mentioned, but the remaining part of the regiment is expected to arrive soon. I must here say we have one of the best Colonels ever was; he has the good will and commands the respect and esteem of all, both officers and privates, and it cannot be otherwise for he is so very kind and has such winning ways. I am much disappointed in the climate here, as I had anticipated that it was very warm, but on the contrary it is quite temperate and agreeable. The Rock of Gibraltar is justly famed and is deserving the name it bears, because of its being so strongly fortified both by nature and art, it may be deemed almost if not quite impregnable. There are only five regiments here at present, including the 100th, besides the Royal Artillery. I could content myself here for life, it is so agreeable.—When out walking we see almost numberless kinds of fruit growing, and such a variety of flowers, those we thought so much of while at home in Canada. It is really delightful to see oranges, lemons and grapes hanging on their boughs over the roads and walks; it causes me to think of home and wish that some of my friends were with me that we might enjoy the beautiful together, for the scenery is truly enchanting. * * We had a great day here on the 24th.—His royal highness the Prince of Wales is here. He visited his own regiment—the 100th—while on board the steamer the day we landed. There is talk that the 100th will make another move to Malta or Corfu, but we cannot say how true it is, and there is a probability that we may remain here for years; but his respects that it makes little difference, for we are contented and happy wherever we are. Please write as often as convenient, and give me all the news.

I remain as ever,
Your affectionate brother,
LUTHER M. SMYTH.

(Address Corp'l L. M. Smyth, Gibraltar.)

TOWN COUNCIL.

MONDAY, July 11, 1859.

Council met. Present—His Worship the Mayor, Messrs. Conger, Henthorn, White, Fowlis, Read, Toole, Bradfield, Kennedy, Morrow and Hogan.

Minutes read and confirmed.

A petition from John Thompson calling the attention of the Council to the inefficiency of the grate at the corner of George and Simcoe streets, to receive and carry off the water, whereby the water ran into his cellar, causing considerable damage, and asking said grate to be repaired, was referred to committee on Streets and Bridges.

A report from the street and bridge com., stating that they have repaired the bridge on London street, near Ledgate's Mill, that the cost for labor was £17 2s 6d, was received and adopted.

The Clerk submitted the returns of parties owing for License, rents, taxes, and otherwise, and his report thereon, was laid on the table.

A report from the com. to whom was referred the By-law for the separation of the Town from the jurisdiction of the Counties Council was read and received.

Accounts from special parties for work done on Spalding's Bay were handed to committee on Streets and Bridges.

An account from Mr. Hogan, was also received and handed over to the Street and Bridge Committee.

Moved by Mr. White, seconded by Mr Conger,—That the By-law to withdraw the Town of Peterboro', from the jurisdiction of the United Counties of Peterboro' and Victoria, be read a first time.—Carried.

The By-law was read a first time.

Moved by Mr. White, seconded by Mr. Conger, that the By-law for the withdrawal of the Town of Peterboro', &c., be read a second time, in Committee of the Whole.

The Council then went into committee of the whole, Mr. Hogan in the Chair. The By-law was read in Committee without amendment.

A report from the Committee on Finance and Assessment recommending the payment to Robert Rowe of his salary of £10 as inspector of buildings, and the reduction of the taxes on the Mill Property of Harmon & Dunham, leased to child and Reaburn, from this rental to the rent value was read, and after some discussion was recommitted for investigation and amendment.

The By-law to provide for the withdrawal of the Town of Peterboro', was ordered to be published in the local papers, as required by the statute.

By-law 109, was read a third time and passed.

An account from A. Edminson, was referred to the Finance Committee, and one from Edwin Poole, to the Charities Committee.

Moved by Mr. Henthorn, seconded by Mr. Hogan,—That the Chief Constable be instructed by this Council, to cause all hogs running at large to be impounded, according to By-law of this Council.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Conger, seconded by Mr. White,—That the Debentures to be issued under By-law 109, be issued in sums of £100 each, and that the said debentures be forwarded to Messrs. McDougall & Bro., Montreal, for sale, and that the Clerk of this Council, under the direction of the Finance Committee, prepare and forward them without delay.—Carried.

On motion Wm. Miller was allowed to pay his taxes in labour upon the Streets.

Mr. Robert Sharpe was appointed pound keeper for this Municipality.

Moved by Mr. Read, seconded by Mr. Kennedy,—That a cheque be issued in favor of the Chairman of the Street and Bridge Committee, amounting to $71 56.—Carried.

The Council then adjourned.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON SEPARATION FROM THE COUNTY.

The Committee to whom was referred the duty of enquiring into the expediency of withdrawing the Town from the jurisdiction of the Council of the United Counties of Peterboro' & Victoria,

Beg to Report:

That they have carefully considered the subject and submit the following as the result of their labours:

By a table prepared by the County Clerk based upon the proceeding of the last session of the Counties' Council, they find the amount to be paid by the Town for County purposes during the present year to be $3,254. The aggregate County assessment is $20,982; showing that the Town contributes within a fraction one sixth of the entire County tax of the United Counties.

In order to discover whether any improvement might be looked for in the future, your committee have examined the Assessment rolls of 1859, upon which the County taxation of 1860 will be based.—Taking the same classification that has prevailed for two years, and adopting the same method of calculation, they find the aggregate value to be $6,667,392, showing an increase over last year's aggregate value of $16,010. The proportionate increase for the Town of Peterboro' would be $2,-634, while the actual increase reaches $162,404! Assuming, again, that the amount required for County purposes next year will be greater, and assuming the same basis of classification to be adopted, the proportion of County tax which the Town would have to contribute would be $3,767, equal to about one shilling in the £ on the present Town assessment!

So enormous a tax, your committee became at once convinced, should not be submitted to if it could be avoided. How this was to be accomplished was their next consideration.

The twenty-sixth clause of the Municipal Act gives to Towns the power, upon obtaining the assent of the electors, to withdraw from the jurisdiction of the Council of the County within which they are situated, upon the following conditions:

"1st After the final passing of the By-law, the amount which the Town is to pay to the County for the expenses of the Administration of Justice, and the use of the Jail, as well as for the then existing debt of the County, if not mutually agreed upon, shall be ascertained by arbitration under this Act; and the agreement or award shall distinguish the amounts to be annually paid for the said expenses, and for the then debt of the County, and the number of years the payment for the debt is to continue;

"2nd In adjusting their award, the arbitrators shall, among other things, take into consideration the amount previously paid by the Town, or which the Town may be then liable to pay, for the construction of roads or bridges by the County without the limits of the Town, and also what the County may have paid, or be liable to pay, for the construction of roads and bridges within the Town; and they shall also ascertain and allow to the Town the value of its interest in all County property, except road and bridges within the Town."

The cost of the administration of Justice, expenses of Jurors, Sheriff's fees, &c., &c. amounts this year to the sum of $5000.—Assuming that the Town should be required to contribute its present proportion of one-sixth of this sum, and in making this assumption, your committee are convinced that in all equity the proportion is much too large, the Town tax for administration of justice, jurors expenses &c., would be $834!

The expenses of the jail would be more than met by the interest of the Town in County property, which the arbitrators are compelled by the statute to allow; and the debt of the County, with the exception of £50 on the Court House Hill, has been all incurred for improvements without the Town. The amount thus contributed by the Town would more than cover the interest on the amount received. In honesty, your committee are convinced that a careful consideration of the instructions to arbitrators in the statute, would require them to reduce instead of increase the amount set down above, $834, as the Town contribution to the County funds; but less they should not do so, and taking the worst view of the case, $1,000 would most certainly meet the highest award that could be made. Were the Town this year separated, the saving would be $2254; and next year if the estimate of your committee be correct, it would be $2767.

Under these circumstances, your committee are unanimous in recommending the immediate passage of a By-law to withdraw the Town from the jurisdiction of the Council of the Counties.

All of which is nevertheless respectfully submitted.

ARRIVAL OF THE "ASIA."

THE WAR NEWS.

A Great Battle.

IMMENSE WAR PREPARATIONS IN ENGLAND AND PRUSSIA.

New York, July 7.

The steamer Asia arrived here to-day, bringing Liverpool and London advices of the 25th ult.

The report that another great battle had taken place is sustained. The following items regarding the battle will be found of some interest:

The Vienna correspondent of the Times says that the pickets of the two armies were in sight of each other, and scarcely a day passes without slight skirmishes.

Garibaldi was accomplishing remarkable feats in surprising the Austrians, making marches of 50 miles in a day, and setting the country in favour of national independence.

The following despatch had been received in Paris from the Emperor—"We have taken all the enemies positions, and captured many cannons."

Despatches from Vienna, dated Saturday, says that news had just been received in that city that a vigorous combat began on the Mincio at one on Friday morning.—Heavy cannonading was also heard at Verona.

The recent tumult in Venice was occasioned by rumors that the French had landed in Pavia, and that Venice would surrender in three days. People then began to mount cockades, with Italian colours, and crowds began to gather in front of Austrian houses and began to hiss. The Austrian patrol were ordered out to fire on the people, but they were received with insults, when they made an attack upon the mob with the butts of the muskets. The military finally cleared the streets. The report that some were killed is not confirmed.

Advices from Malta state that eight steam liners were ready for departure, as asserted, for the Adriatic.

The official Preussiche Zeitung of Wednesday says the Franco-Sardinian army is moving near to the frontiers of Germany.

"The Prussian Government regards the security of Germany as entrusted to its care.

"The Italian conflict is assuming ever-increasing dimensions."

England and France are arming on the greatest scale. The Prussian Government would be faithless to its duty and to the sense of national honour, if she should neglect to act commensurately with the spirit by which Prussia has become great.—Prussia is free from every engagement; she obeys only those obligations which spring from the innermost nature of her state interests. It will soon be seen whether Prussia's initiative will be supported with the necessary weight by the German states.

The policy of Prussia stands firm, and whoever lays obstacles in its way may consider that he is rendering service to the enemies of the Fatherland.

It was announced in Paris that a corps d'armee of 60,000 men, mainly from African regiments, is excepted shortly in the Adriatic Sea.

Despatches from Milan confirm the accounts that the French troops are advancing towards the Valtelline.

Advices from Rome say an attempt was made there on Sunday to display the tri-colour flag, and proclaim the dictatorship of Victor Emmanuel; but General Goyon interfered to prevent it.

The Pope has notified his protest against the dismembership of his States to the powers represented at the Paris conference.—He has also communicated to the Cardinals a letter of the Emperor Napoleon, guaranteeing the independence of the Papal States.

Advices from Constantinople say that Said Pasha had been summoned to send his Rumelia, but replied that the indecisive policy of the Porte comprises Egypt; he therefore will send no succour, but will put his army on a war footing.

The following are the latest despatches from the seat of war:—

TURIN, June 22.—Yesterday the Emperor and the King quitted Brescia for the camp amid the acclamations of the populace. The allied armies have occupied Lonato, Castiglione and Montebelluna.

Advices have been received from Arozza to the 21st.

The Swiss regiments which have left Rome attacked Perugia on the 20th.—Great resistance was made, notwithstanding that the numbers were few. After three hours fighting outside the town, the Swiss entered. The combat continued for two hours in the streets. The Swiss trampled down and killed even women and inoffensive persons. The next day the outrages, arrests and firing on people were re-commenced. The town is in a state of siege.

TURIN, June 23.—The main body of the Austrian army is on the left bank of the Mincio. The Piedmontese have advanced towards Peschiera, and after a vigorous encounter repulsed the outposts of the enemy, whose loss was considerable. The entire French force has passed the Chiese at Montechiaro, and pushed a reconnaissance as far as Goito, and surprised the main Austrian guard, which lost nine prisoners and some killed.

VIENNA, June 22.—Austrian correspondence announces that the French Government has strongly disapproved of the conduct of the Admiral of the French fleet before Venice, in capturing some barks belonging to fishermen.

VIENNA, June 23.—Prince Esterhazy's visit to London is unaccompanied by any official mission whatever.

VENICE, June 20.—The commander of the fortifications has announced that several disturbers of the peace have been expelled from the town. The arrival of foreigners at Venice is not allowed except on special permission. The Archduke Maximilian has returned from Verona.

VERONA, June 23rd.—The head quarters of the Emperor of Austria have been removed to Vallegio. The feeling of the troops is excellent. At Antivari English as well as French war steamers are expected.

BERNE, June 12.—Austrian troops are constructing a telegraph line between Botzen and Lardeck. Austrian troops of Italian regiments are repassing through the Tyrol for Germany. 2,000 of them have arrived at Malo, and 3,000 more are to follow.

BERNE, June 24.—Despatches from Milan confirm the news that 5,000 French had been despatched towards Vaellese at Bormio.

The Austrians continue to construct block houses, redoubts and fortifications at Nanders.

300 Austrians and one company of volunteers consisting of students are marching to occupy the passage of Stelvio.

The Archduke of Tyrol has arrived at Nanders to superintend the enrollment of 24,000 men in Tyrol and Vorarberg. The Tyrolese find related difficulties about entering the military service.

CORFU, June 19.—According to letters from Malta to 16th inst., a fleet of eight French steam liners is ready for departure, destined, it is asserted, for the Adriatic sea.

LONATO, June 23.—This morning the Emperor accompanied by the King traversed the environs of the town, and pushed a reconnaissance as far as Desenano, on the borders of the lake.

ARRIVAL OF THE CANADA.

LATEST WAR NEWS.

RESIGNATION OF MR. COBDEN.

Sackville, N. B., July 12.

The royal mail steamship Canada, from Liverpool on Saturday the 2nd inst., passed Cape Race at 5 30 p. m. on Sunday the 10th inst., and arrived at Halifax to-day. She was boarded off the Cape by the News Yatch of the New York Associated Press, and a brief summary of her news procured which was started from St. Johns yesterday but only reached this place this forenoon.

St. John's Newfoundland July 11

The following is a summary of the news by the Canada, which passed Cape Race at 5 p.m. on Sunday.

The steamship City of Washington from New York via St. John's Newfoundland, where she called to take out passengers by the Edinburg arrived at Queenstown on the 1st of July.

The news by the Canada does not present any new features of unusual importance. There has been no more fighting, and the allies continued their movements across the Mincio unmolested.

The Emperor Napoleon had changed his head-quarters from Valla to Vallegia.

The Sardinians has completed the investment of Peschiera from the Lake Garda to the Mincio.

The Eperor of Austria was expected to remain in Italy.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The English Ministry has pronounced for strict neutrality.

Mr. Cobden had declined a seat in the Cabinet.

In the Liverpool Cotton market the sales of cotton for the week amounted to 57,000 bales. The prices of the lower qualities had declined ¼ per lb.

The breadstuffs market was drooping, and all descriptions were slightly lower.

Provisions dull and quotations barely maintained.

THE BATTLE OF SOLFERINO.

New York, July 12.

The New York Times of to-day contains letters from Mr. Raymond and "Malakoff," its Paris correspondent, dated from the battle field of Solferino. Mr. Raymond says that not less than 400,000 men were engaged, and of these not less than 30,000 dead or disabled lie this bright starry night upon this bloody field. The battle commenced a little before five o'clock in the morning, not far from sunrise and lasted till late in the evening.

SEVERE DROUGHT.

The country is suffering from the most severe drought that has occurred within the memory of the present generation. In 1826 there was a longer time of dry weather. The drought commenced early in spring, and continued throughout the summer and autumn; but there were none of these penetrating winds which have dried and bound up the ground this season. For scarcity of water and brown withered pastures there is no parallel season since 1826. People who remember well the appearance of the country, say that the streams are as low as they were in the autumn of that famous year. Indeed old people say that they never saw the Doon so low as at present, though they have lived all their lives on its banks. On many farms which are regarded as generally well-watered, there is not a mouthful of drink for cattle and horses. The whole has to be carted. Deep springs give the only supply, where people are at a distance from lochs and rivers. On deep lands in fertile condition there is still good grass, but on heavy soils, generally there is a very scanty bite, and the herbage on light land is withered away. The make of cheese is better than the appearance of the pastures would indicate. The grass, though insufficient in quantity is more nutritious in dry than in wet weather, and a given quantity of milk yields a greater weight of cheese. The make at present, however must be decidedly under the average at this season of the year. The crops, though very unpromising in many places, are looking better on the whole on well manured land than might have been expected from the extreme want of moisture. A great part of the early sown wheat has a fair appearance. It will be short in straw, but it has the great advantage of earliness. Spring wheat and oats look very ill on stiff land. Some of the later sown oat fields are quite red.—These, we are afraid, cannot now recover; but a good fall of rain would give a wonderful impulse to the oat crop in general. Ryegrass hay is now ready for cutting over a large extent of the country. It has not been so poor since 1826. Everything at present indicates a scarcity of winter keep. The cereals are light, and there is very little braird of mangold or turnips. Early additional dry day has now a marked effect on the prospect of a supply of food for stock.—Ayr (Scotland) Advertiser.

THE END OF A MYSTERY.

The Cleveland Herald recently printed several columns of a sensation character, the main features of which were the mysterious disappearance from that city some years ago of Dr. Baltzly and the strange conduct of his wife, whose movements were chronicled and united with various personages in a style bordering on the romantic and the ridiculous. The plain unvarnished tale is, that a man named Baltzly had his life insured for the next round sum of ten thousand dollars. A short time after the insurance was effected the Doctor suddenly disappeared, and his bereaved widow gave out that he had been drowned, and instituted a suit against the company for the insurance money. It was thought for a time that the wife had put an end to her husband. Notwithstanding all the reports of death by drowning, and the surmises of his being murdered, it appears that Dr. Baltzly still lives, and is at this time a resident in Canada, where he has doubtless awaited with some degree of anxiety the result of the effort of his wife to secure the money on his life insurance. She, however, has not succeeded in obtaining the money, the courts having decided against her in the case. The romantic feature in the affair is that the doctor's better half, whilst fully cognizant of his corporeal existence, has rather ignored the fact, and been on terms of somewhat suspicious intimacy with certain individuals, who have been drawn to her by the convenient law of natural "affinities."

GARIBALDI'S LAST FEAT.

As I have mentioned Garibaldi and his corps it will, perhaps, interest you to hear how he came from Bergamo to Brescia.—The Austrians had scarcely withdrawn from Bergamo when a messenger was caught on the road who brought orders from head-quarters to hold Bergamo at any price, if it had not been given up yet. It would have been rather awkward had the order come before, for Garibaldi, without any cannon, would scarcely have thought of attacking the Austrians in a town enclosed by high ramparts, with only two outlets. As it was, the National Guards fell to making barricades so as to keep the place against the Austrians should they attempt to return. In the meantime Garibaldi went after the Austrians, who were retiring towards Brescia. In order to mislead them he turned down towards Romano, which is close to the high road from Milan to Brescia; the Austrians followed to bar the road to Brescia, they had scarcely gone off on that scent when Garibaldi turned again to the north, and making a march of 45 miles in less than 24 hours, appeared before and in Brescia before the Austrians had the remotest idea of his whereabouts. How little they knew appears from the fact that the Major attached as chef d'etat major to General Urban's division was caught with several orderlies in the town of Brescia, into which he had come from the neighborhood, never suspecting the presence of Garibaldi's corps.

The most beautiful thing, however, was that while the main body went in all haste to Brescia 24 men were put on two omnibusses, the two officers commanding them, Colonel Tarr and Major Camozzi, following in little two-wheeled carts of the country. The whole went off to Lake Iseo and raised the Val Canonica. The people rose immediately, some 4,500 stand of arms were ready, with which the National Guard was armed, the Austrian steamer on the lake was taken possession of, and the two officers returned, leaving the 24 men there as garrison, but bringing 250 volunteers away to Garibaldi's camp.

Such marvellous feats of mobility can of course only be done with troops who are unencumbered by baggage; a little bag containing a shirt, and perhaps a pair of socks, is the only baggage which officers or men have. They make war according to the late Sir Charles Napier's ideas.—They have good boots, with leather gaiters up to the middle of the legs; the trousers, rather loose, are stuck into the gaiters; a short tunic of light gray linen, and over it a gray coat reaching down to the knees, a light cap and the rifle complete the accoutrement. There is no difference in this respect between officers and soldiers. If, as is natural after such marches, things are worn out, the inhabitants of the first town in which they appear give of their own free will ten times more than they want. The troops have thus such plenty that government never even thinks of supplying any of their wants.

THE NEW CABINET.

From the London Times.

What must strike everybody upon running over the names of the new Cabinet is that it will be at least a more efficient Administration than the last or its predecessor. With a bare majority, and a not very united party, Lord Palmerston is under the necessity of constructing a Government that shall be strong in itself. Lord Palmerston has had to go out of the old circle and the hard beaten ground in which power has so long moved. He has had to negotiate at every step, and to win allies when possibly he would have consulted his own genial temper by choosing friends. He had to make treaty with Lord John Russel. It is the law of self-preservation that compelled him to invite Mr. Gladstone. Lord Campbell, it is avowed, must be Lord Chancellor, because Sir R. Bethell is required in the Commons. Sir C. Wood is an able and hardworking man, and his last administration of the Indian board was the most successful episode of his career. Sir G. C. Lewis, if not persuasive, is quite able to conduct our domestic legislation, and to keep the country in its present peaceful state. The Duke of Somerset is said to be a remarkable administrator, and for that reason is put in the Admiralty. Mr. S. Herbert is industrious, and a most agreeable speaker. He is to be War Minister, and we most devoutly hope will not have to do more in his department than to carry into effect the sanitary reforms to which he has so long devoted his attention. The Duke of Newcastle is a man of high character and respectability: he has already had the Colonies, and has done his work well. Lord Granville, though not Premier will be as good a President of the Privy Council as any before him.—Lord Elgin is almost too great a man to put into the Post-Office. The Duke of Argyle brings a Duke's name, great power of debate, and many friends. Mr. Cobden should he accept the office marked out for him is the very hero and deliverer of trade. Mr. M. Gibson, who has destroyed so many Ministries, will perhaps endeavor to maintain that with which he is himself connected. Sir G. Grey, after many years' service in the most laborious offices, contents himself with a sinecure. We could have wished a more appropriate close to a long official career. Would not a pension have been preferable? Mr. Cardwell shews his industry in taking public works, and has only to follow the example of Sir B. Hall, who we are told, is to be raised to the Peerage. These make up the Cabinet. Sir A. Cockburn is to be Chief Justice of England; Mr. R. Lowe, Vice-President of the Council. Lord Clarence Paget is to be Secretary to the Admiralty; and Mr. C. Fortescue, Lord Wodehouse, and Mr. Maxey Under-Secretaries to the Colonial, Foreign, and Home Offices respectively.

There never was a more powerful cast, so far as the men are concerned. In the first there are sixteen Cabinet Ministers, while several of the men out of the Cabinet are of the rank of statesmen. The Cabinet is, indeed, almost overcharged with power of one sort or another. It contains two men who have been premiers, three Dukes, two popular chiefs, and several men of long and varied official experience; a Lord Chancellor who is still young at eighty, and at least half a dozen men who, having worked out several important controversies, must by this time have corrected their own conclusions by one another's experience. Four distinct sections are amply represented in the Cabinet. There is no reason why they should not manage their differences within doors, and if they do, who can resist them? No doubt, such a Cabinet will be liable to all the suspicion and all the sarcasms which from time immemorial have been launched against fusions and composite arrangements. Of course, it is not a Utopian Government, for England is not Utopia. An English Government we take not to be a theory, or the development of a principle, or a collection of heroic personages. It is a room full of the best men of the day, whoever they may happen to be. We must take them as they come. A statesman, if he be worth anything, forces himself into his position, and compares us as a great soldier does a state or a race. So a Cabinet is a collection of individuals who have raised themselves to power, perhaps in spite of us. We have no choice but to accept them. We cannot help ourselves. There is even here no reason to thank the British public for their confidence. They are men who have fought and won the state, driving out the adverse party, as the French are driving the Austrians out of Lombardy. So we do not complain or think it any man's fault that the fortress has been ill defended and the besiegers are now within its walls.—From the number of powerful men and the different opinions comprised in the Cabinet, there are some dangers to its permanence, but it is too strong to be soon uprooted from without.

THE BRITISH MINISTRY.

The following is a complete list of the new Ministry.

THE CABINET.

First Lord of the Treasury, Viscount Palmerston, K. G.
Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. W. E. Gladstone.

SECRETARIES OF STATE.

More Trouble in India.

A mutiny has broken out among the European soldiers in India, which threatens disastrous consequences, unless wisely and generously dealt with.

The dissatisfied are the British soldiers of the late East India Company's army, numbering about 25,000 men, who were enlisted and attested to serve the Company. By the 50th clause of the Act vesting the government of India in the Queen, it is provided that the civil and military servants of the Company shall be transferred to the service of the Crown; the soldiers of the Company thus becoming a part of the British army.

To this transfer, without their consent, the soldiers object; they claim that they are not bound to serve any master but the one they engaged with; and that this principle is so well established that if a man is enlisted specially for one regiment, he cannot be removed without his consent into another.

Lord Clyde and General Mansfield sympathise with the men in their view of the case, at the same time that they are determined to maintain discipline.

The men demand that they shall be allowed the option of re-enlistment with a fresh bounty or their discharge. This demand Lord Clyde caused to be sent home to the Imperial Government in November last; and in the meantime the men were content to await the decision of the authorities.

Lord Canning the Governor General, and Major General Birch were adverse to the claims of the soldiers, and on the matter being referred to England, the authorities decided that when once a British subject enters the service of a trustee of the State, he can be transferred to the service of the State itself without his consent.

When this decision became known a mutinous demonstration was made at Meerut about the beginning of May; the men of Tomb's famous troop of Bengal Horse Artillery and those of the 2nd European Light Cavalry having resolved to carry off their horses and guns, and not to give them up until their grievances were redressed. Lord Clyde was at once sent for.

At parade of the Artillery on the morning of the 2nd of May, few of the dissatisfied appeared, and the rest only yielding to the personal entreaties of their officers to be present. The men were addressed by General Bradford on their fault and duty, and he afterwards called upon those willing to serve the Queen to step to the front.—As one man, the old soldiers stepped out, and a few of those of average service; but the others, one third of the whole stood fast; they were disarmed and marched to barracks.

The Cavalry, with the exception of a few volunteers from the 9th Lancers, also refused parade; but being induced by the expostulations of their officers to be present, were similarly treated; none but the volunteers came forward. They were also ordered to the barracks.

Strong pickets of the 75th Regiment were posted, and a troop of Horse Artillery turned out ready for action.

On Wednesday, the 4th of May, the second European Light Cavalry ordered their syces to saddle and bring round their horses, which they refused to do; the Queen's troops in the station were again turned out to act against their own comrades if necessary.

The correspondent of the London Times, from whose account we make this abridgement, says, in conclusion:

On Thursday all seemed quiet, but the infantry pickets were still posted near the Bengal Artillery guns, and Fraser's troop was in readiness to act. Lord Clyde was expected, and it was believed the worst was over. Admitting it to be so what will the Government do? Let them take it as indisputable that the feelings of the British Indian Army on this point are identical, though the men may not be so foolish and ill-disciplined or violent as their comrades at Meerut. The news will spread in the most exaggerated form through all the Sikhs, and it is stated already that a Sergeant of the Goorka regiment at Meerut told Mr. Boisragon, the magistrate that the men of the 65th would not fire on their fellow-countrymen and old comrades of Tomb's troop if they were called upon to act. True or not, the story shows how the natives are watching every movement around them, and how important it is that there should be prompt and cheerful obedience on the part of the British army in India, whether they are acknowledged to be the Queen's or belong to the hybrid without a name which at the present moment has been erected, as we have seen to assume an unbecoming and dangerous attitude.

A Disaster on Lake Huron.

EXTRAORDINARY ESCAPE FROM SHIPWRECK.

On Friday last a party of ladies and gentlemen, the large majority of them residents of Toronto, left this city on a projected excursion to Sault Ste. Marie. The intention of those comprising the company was to take the steamer Ploughboy from Collingwood, and proceed thence to their destination, calling at any places of interest on their route. But shortly before the arrival of the vessel at Lonely Island, in Georgian Bay, a part of the machinery, the cross-heads, snapped in half, and it became absolutely necessary, in consequence, for the safety of the ship's crew of the steam. The Ploughboy being, this most of all the steamers on Lake Huron, unprovided with masts, she was thus necessarily left to the mercy of the winds and waves which drifted her at their pleasure. The danger of such a position being apparent, steps of the crew endeavoured to proceed in an open boat to Cape Smith, a distance of seventy-five miles, to secure the aid of another Canadian to tow the disabled into safe anchorage. But long before the destination was met for could be obtained, the Ploughboy had been shortly but hopelessly and helplessly drifting to that portion of the coast lying west of Chicken Point, and in spite of every precaution, a little before the dawn of Sunday morning, found herself on the unfortunate vessel within fifty yards of a precipitous rock-bound shore, the height of which is found, when measured, to be 1,000 feet. Of course all hope of saving the vessel was now abandoned, and the only thought was how to save the lives of those on board. Fortunately the weather was calm, and at 3 o'clock on Sunday morning the passengers, with the exception of the captain, engineers, firemen, and stewards, who remained on board to the last, commenced to disembark in the yawl, which, being but little more than sufficient to contain the number of persons on board, was obliged to make several trips to the shore. In doing this without accident, the small rowboat was found useful, as a few minutes' row enabled the yawl to land her load, and return for another. Provisions and cooking utensils were also landed, and a fire kindled, around which the shipwrecked passengers, on their arrival, commenced preparations for breakfast, and prepared, as best they could, to pass the night. Fortunately, the weather continued favourable, and the passengers were enabled to land all their baggage, and the provisions and stores of the vessel, before the storm which had been brewing during the night burst upon the lake. The vessel, which was a wooden one, soon began to break up, and before the storm had subsided, she had entirely disappeared. The passengers, after remaining on the island for two days, were taken off by the steamer Canadian, and brought to Collingwood, from which place they proceeded to their homes.

Attempt to Assassinate Louis Napoleon.

The Florence correspondent of the Providence Journal relates the following story:—

"A French officer here tells the following story. He says it has not been printed in the French journals—and certainly we have seen no account—but the fact is known to the army, and the story is true. On Good Friday, if at no other time in the year, all good Catholics partake of the communion. On that day, the 21st April last, according to his habit, the Emperor was to receive the consecrated wafer in the chapel of the Tuileries. Before going to the chapel he was told that he must not eat the holy particle that was to be offered him, as it had been prepared with a subtle and malignant poison for the purpose of destroying his life. The informant was a party to the diabolical secret, but horror of conscience and reverence for the Emperor led him to betray the conspiracy. The Emperor knelt at the altar during the mass, and did not eat the bread. When the office was finished the officiating priest was invited into the apartment of the Empress to partake of a collation, while the wafer was submitted to a chemical examination. It was found to contain, as the informant had said, a concentrated poison. The priest is now in a fortress in Algeria. The soldier, says the priest, was an instrument of the Jesuits; but whether in Italy, Austria, France or England, is not understood. So much for the story."

RAILWAY TRAVELLING.

"Killed 276, wounded 556."—These are the statistics of a very serious affair; not quite of a pitched battle, perhaps but at any rate of a brilliant combat or a well contested fight. This time, however, the figures are not telegraphed from Italy. It is a home concern, and important one too, for the struggle is incessant, and the casualties occur year after year. They respect, in fact, the deaths and injuries resulting from Railway Travelling. In one fashion or other 276 people were killed, and 553 were maimed on the various railways in Great Britain and Ireland during the year 1858. True it is that by a rigorous analysis we can deprive this return of its most alarming features, but computation is accurate nevertheless, and, what is worse, the danger is not on the decline. In one important respect, the report is heavier than in any year since 1853. That nearly 300 lives should be lost on railways in the course of twelvemonths will appear to many persons an incredible statement, and the truth is that nine-tenths of the casualties in question have no bearing whatever on the safety of railway travelling. They occur to trespassers who are struck or run over by trains in motion, or to railway servants or laborers who incur the danger in the ordinary prosecution of their callings. In these cases the fatality of the accidents is very remarkable. Casualties of an ordinary description usually produce many more injuries than deaths, but here the deaths far overbalance the injuries. Of railway servants or laborers 131 were killed, while 101 only were injured; of trespassers 11 only out of 73 escaped with their lives, the remaining 62 being killed outright. In the case of railway passengers these proportions with one instructive exception, are completely reversed. Upwards of 400 passengers were injured, whereas only 26 were killed by those accidents which are defined as beyond the sufferers control. No sooner however, is this condition removed, and the fault charged upon the passengers themselves, than we find 28 casualties out of 43 proving actually fatal. The critical figures, therefore, are to be found in the 20 deaths and the 410 injuries of railway passengers occurring in a space of twelve months from the mishaps or defects of railway management, but it should be added that it took nearly 140,000,000 passengers to produce them. Not one passenger in 8,000,000 came by his death on a railway independently of any fault of his own, and even the aggregate of 26 deaths is greatly swelled by that one fearful disaster on the Wolverhampton line, which of itself sent 16 lives. This brought the total up to a higher point than has been reached since 1853. We have repeated twenty times in these columns and we now state once more, that the real dangers of railway travelling arise almost entirely from railway management. It is only in a small minority of instances that a casualty is even apparently traceable to the failure of material, and even when a broken down tural, or an axle break, it is frequently from defects which admitted of timely remedy. All these risks, however, go practically for nothing, nor is it very often that rather rue of the rule. The one great source of disaster is collision, and to this encroachment takes fifty different forms. Sometimes the excess of traffic is greater than the line can safely bear, and as important, indeed, in this connection than in certain instances of short lines light traffic, and scanty receipts, combined are utterly unknown. The directors of this head are positively astounding. Taking a summary of the last eight years and a half, it is found that, with an expenditure of £3,000,000 sterling on railway, all of this £300,000 paid in dividends, and £1,000,000 sterling borrowed to boot, the directors have contrived to lose the enormous sum of £1,500,000 sterling, or £200,000 per annum. Such is the result of the management in the first. Nothing but a rather than a the small shareholder would support a director who could show such a result. Fortunately and seven, however, and at length Providence took a hint himself, commenced operations in Parliament, and prepared, as

A JACK SHEPPARD IN DUMFRIES.

Some weeks ago there were a number of robberies committed in the town of Paris. One of these—the robbery of Mr. Barclay's watch establishment, amounting to $1000 worth of property, was committed during the night in the most skilful manner, without leaving the least clue to the discovery of the perpetrators. The next in the Catalogue was the robbery of the express office kept by Mr. Nisbet, in open daylight, under the following circumstances. A young man entered the office of Mr. Nisbet who also keeps a book-store, and addressed some trifling remarks to Miss Nisbet, who happened to be behind the counter, then helping himself to a chair, he seated himself for observation. Something requiring Miss Nisbet to pass through a door into an adjoining room, she was absent from the office for about one minute, when hearing a noise, she returned and found the stranger sitting in a position different from that in which she had left him, within arms length of a drawer containing money. He said he would return in an hour and purchase a book whose value he had asked, and immediately walked out. In a short time a quantity of money, about $50 was missed, and suspicion fell upon the young man who had just left. A messenger was despatched to the railway station in search. On arriving the stranger had changed his dress, so that it was with difficulty the messenger recognized him. On seeing he was suspected he fled but was captured on Thursday week by some young men who were acquainted with him. His name is John Patterson. His father lately owned a farm in the vicinity of Glenmorris It is said that two officers were in pursuit of him about two weeks ago, for another robbery, the particulars of which we have not heard. He has also been suspected of a number of other thefts, and once or twice of incendiarism.

A CONSPIRACY TO BLOW UP STEAMBOATS.

We learn from Captain Vigor, of the May Queen, that just as he left for Cleveland on Saturday night, a man named Cooley was arrested there, charged with conspiring to blow up the splendid Southern Railroad steamer, City of Buffalo, and that complete evidence of designs was found.

The facts of the case, we learn, are these:

Some weeks since, while Captain Ward was at Cleveland on business, this man Cooley came to him, professing great friendship for him, and denouncing the opposition of the railroads, which lead to the establishment of a second line of boats between Cleveland and Buffalo. After talking a while, he intimated that he knew of means which would remove this opposition and give Captain Ward control of the route. Perceiving that the fellow was a scoundrel and evidently harbored some mischevious design, the Captain took him into a private room, where the villain unfolded his plan. But before completing it, the Captain was called away and made an appointment to meet him the next day.

The appointment was kept, Captain Ward having taken the precaution to stow a good witness away under a bed in the room. Cooleys plan was then unfolded in detail, and consisted in providing heavy charges of powder in tin canisters, so made as to be fastened to the boat under water connected together with a slow fuse. He proposed to blow up both railroad boats for $300. The Captain gave him $5 with which to get tin boxes made, and promised to meet him again last week. He then noticed the Superintendent of the Southern Road, and the agent at Cleveland of the plan.

The second meeting took place last week, when another witness was securely hidden under the bed of the state-room and when the plan was again fully discussed.—Upon Captain Ward's expressing some doubts as to his ability to accomplish so great and hazardous an undertaking, he stated that he had blown up one vessel in a similar manner, and gave the name, time and place. The Captain then gave him $20 with which he was to procure fifty pounds of powder, and it was arranged that the City of Buffalo which remains in Cleveland over the Sabbath, should be blown up at her dock last evening. The officers were notified of what was going on, and fearing what they might anticipate them in his eagerness to accomplish the infernal undertaking, pounced upon him on Saturday night. The magazine which he had proposed to use was found, we are told, all charged and ready for use, and there is no doubt but that the wretch intended to commit the diabolical deed, and that he was capable of doing it. The charge of powder, it is said, would have completely torn the boat in pieces.

Cooley had been a driver in the river at Cleveland, in the employ of a man named Nelson, and unquestionably possessed the skill, as well as hardihood, to carry to a successful termination one of the boldest conspiracies it has been our lot ever to record.

THE GREAT BALLOON VOYAGE.

THE ACCOUNT OF MR. WISE.

Although it was intended to have started on this voyage on the 23rd of June, we were delayed in our preparations until the 1st of July. By 6 o'clock p. m. the airship Atlantic was duly inflated, and while we were putting him in trim with ballast and provisions, Mr. Bogalo, lessee of the St. Louis Museum, who had kindly volunteered to escort us over the Mississippi in his balloon Comet, got ready for the occasion, and upon a signal agreed recorded from the ground. At 7. 20 p. m., the Atlantic was ready to sail. Messrs. La Mountain and Gager, thinking some difficulty might arise at the start if they should attach the fan wheels to the shafts and wheel-gearing, determined to omit that until we should be fairly under way next morning. Having had much experience in hard winds, and the perils of hauling a balloon under them, we had constructed at St. Louis a good wicker-work car (which with a good and strong constructive hoop, are the precursors in three parts,) which was suspended between the boat and bottom, and about eight feet above the former and eighteen feet of the hoop, so that the bottom hung with the balloon whenever the latter was fully distended. The boat contained 350 pounds of ballast, one bucket of water, one basket of lemonade, with abundance of bread and cold poultry and sandwiches, delicacies not to be overlooked by the hungry. Mr. La Mountain took charge of the boat and ballast, and took his place in the car; and Mr. Gager took the other and took charge of the sheets and compass. Mr. Hyde took place of the St. Louis Aeronaut, took his seat in the middle, with note-book and pencil, as historian. Although Mr. Hyde was not in the original programme, we unanimously agreed to let him accompany us, provide it would not interfere with our ultimate design; and as it was arranged that, under any circumstances where the balloon should fail, the boat with its occupants should be disposed of, and myself or Mr. La Mountain should proceed with the voyage alone.

The basket contained 350 pounds of ballast, a barometer, wet and dry bulb, thermometer, beside a quantity of wines and provisions; and I took my place in the basket in charge of the valve rope, and director of the general plan of the voyage, by the unanimous consent of the party engaged in this long devised enterprise. I must say here that Mr. La Mountain took in charge part of the programme, that none but a cool and accomplished aeronaut could be trusted with; and especially the night-sailing. At 7 20 p. m. we set sail from Washington Square of St. Louis, and our course at starting was north of east. When we got up and over the Mississippi and well under way, we saw Mr. Brooks land in a clear place, about sunset.

At 8 30 p. m. the shades of the evening shut from our view the noble city of St. Louis and the father of waters, though it continued light until after 9. Mr. La Mountain having suffered from sickness on Thursday, and being too unable to work hard under a burning sun at the inflation, left much hard labor for me at that work. I submitted the whole thing to his charge for the night, with the understanding to have me waked whenever he wanted the valve worked, and he took it with alacrity. Before I went to sleep we had mounted to a height at which the balloon become completely distended, and where found the current due east. Here it became chilly, and Mr. La Mountain, as well as all of us, suffered from the change of air; and with all the clothing we put on us it was still uncomfortable, though the thermometer stood at 42, and the barometer at 23,4 and this was the lowest of both the instruments during the whole voyage, except the crossing of Lake Ontario.

Mr. La Mountain proposed to take the lower current as long as it would take us but a few points north of east, and I told him to do as he deemed best, and report his reckoning in the morning. After bidding the party in the boat a good night and God speed, I coiled myself up in blankets, and laid down as best I could, and in a few moments was sound asleep, and knew of nothing but repose until 11 30 p. m.

At this time Mr. La Mountain again mounted for the upper current; being desirous of making a little more easting, he hailed me to open the valve, as the balloon had become so tense, and the gas was rushing from the neck with a noise, but finding no answer from me, he expected that I was being smothered in the gas, and he admonished Mr. Gager to mount to my car by a rope provided for that purpose, and Mr. Gager found me breathing spasmodically, but a good shaking and the removal of the neck of the balloon from my face, with plenty of pure cold air around me soon brought me back to a knowledge of what was going on, and I resolved to sleep no more during the night.

At midnight I felt quite well, with an invigorated spirit of observation and interest in our experiment. The whole dome of heaven was lit up with a mellow phosphorescent light, the stars shone with a crystaline brilliancy and the milky way looked like an illuminated stratum of cumulus clouds.—Whenever we crossed water the heaven-lit dome was as visible below by reflection as above. So remarkable was this phosphorescent light of the atmosphere that the balloon looked translucent, and looked like light shining through oiled paper. We could also tell prairie from forest, and by keeping the eye for a moment downward we could see the roads, fences, fields, and even houses quite distinctly at an elevation not over a mile, and even at the greatest elevation we could discern prairie from woodland, and from water.

Whenever we ballord it was followed by a distinct echo, and even this served as a differential index to height. We always found a response in numerous bow-wow-wows, and these, too were always indicative of the fullness and sparseness of the habitations below, as we could hear them for many miles around us. Mr. La Mountain remarked that nobody lived in that country but dogs, or else the people barked like dogs, he having got a little out of humor, became nobody could tell him in what State we were sailing, and he gave up the enquiry with the remark that it must be over some other country than America, as we had been moving along at a rapid pace.

At three a. m., we came to a general conclusion that we were somewhere over the State of Indiana or Ohio. At four a. m., we passed a city, but could not make it out, but at five a. m., we discovered Lake Erie ahead of us, and then concluded that the city we left a little south of our track must have been Fort Wayne. At six a. m. we passed Toledo, and about an hour afterward we lowered to the margin of the lake a little below Sandusky. After a few moments consultation, and a review of our ballast, we determined to risk the length of Lake Erie, and to test the notion that balloons cannot be kept up long over water, because of some peculiar affinity of the two—a notion that it had never any belief with me. Just as we were wrapping up the lead a little steam screw that was propelling up a river or bay headed for our track, and some one aboard of her very quaintly cried aloud to us; "that is the lake ahead of you." Mr. La Mountain cried back, "Is it Lake Erie?" and the answer was, "Yes, it is, and you had better look out." Our good friend the propellery finding that we discarded his kindness, rounded off again, and sounded us a good bye with his steam whistle, and went his way up the river.

Here we mounted up until the balloon got full, and the barometer fell to twenty-three, in order to make along near the southern shore of the lake, but at Mr. La Mountain's suggestion, that we should make the city of Buffalo by sailing but a few hundred feet above the surface of the water, and as the valve cable we gradually sank to within 500 feet of the water. Here we found a gentle gale of about a speed of a mile per minute, and we resolved to float on it until we should have in sight of Buffalo, and then rise and sail over it. This was a most interesting part of our voyage. We overtook seven steamboats, passed several stations, and should soon have them sailing on the horizon in our rear. One of these others remarked as we passed that "You are going it like thunder." At 10 20 a. m. we were skirting along the Canada shore and sailed near the mouth of the Welland Canal, and soon began to ascend for our more easterly current so as to sail Buffalo in our track, but we rushed by near the Falls of Niagara, and Niagara Falls, crossing Grand Island, leaving Buffalo to the right and Lockport on the left of us on our journey course. Finding ourselves destitute of New York, but too far south to make the city of New York, it was agreed that we should make a landing near Rhinebeck, Dutchess county, where we left Mr. Gager and Mr. Hyde, and Mr. La Mountain and myself to pursue the voyage at a point at Boston or Portland. Accordingly we descended gradually, but before we got within a thousand feet of the earth we found a most terrific gale sweeping along below. The woods roared like a beat of Niagara, the surface of the earth was filled with clouds of dust, and I told my friends certain destruction awaited us if we should touch the earth in that tornado. The huge Atlantic was making a terrific sweep eastward; already were we near the tops of the trees of a tall forest, and I cried out somewhat excitedly, "for God's sake heave overboard anything you lay your hands on. La Mountain' and in a moment he responded 'all right' standing on the side of the boat with a shaft and wheels, intended for the working of the fan wheels, and ready to heave it over should it become necessary.

Mr. Hyde looked up to my ear, and very solemnly said, "This is an exciting time, Professor. What shall we do?" "Trust to Providence and our energies," said I.—We were fast running on to Lake Ontario, and O! how terribly it was foaming, moaning and howling. I said "La Mountain, I have 150 pounds of ballast in my car yet, and a heavy valise, an express bag (sent to the United States Express Company's Office in Broadway, New York,) and a lot of provisions."

"Well, if that won't do, I will cut my boat for ballast, and we ran keep above water until we reach the opposite shore," which was near a hundred miles off in the direction we were then going.

Here I handed my ballast down to La Mountain, as we were rapidly mounting above the terrific gale, believing that by that course we should at least get out of its main track.

Everything now indicated that we should now perish in the water or on the land; and our only salvation was to keep afloat until we got out of the gale, if we could. I said "You must all get into the basket, if you want to be saved, should we ever reach the land. And I truly tell you that the perils of the land are even more terrible than those of the water, with our machines; and it would be easier to meet death by drowning than to have our bodies mangled by dashing against rocks and trees." By this time Mr. Gager and Mr. Hyde had clambered into the basket with me. Mr. Hyde said very coolly, "I am prepared to die, but I would rather die on land than in water." I said "What do you say, Mr. Gager?" He replied I would rather meet it on land but do as you think best. Mr. La Mountain was busily engaged in collecting what he could for ballast. Everything was now valuable to us that had weight. Our carpet bags our instruments, the Express Bag our provisions, were all ready to go, and go they did, one after another, until we were reduced to the express bag,—that went overboard last.

We now discried the shore, some forty miles ahead, pearing between a sombre bank of clouds and the water horizon, but we were swooping at a fearful rate on the turbulent water, and in another moment, crash went the boat upon the water sidewise, staving in the two planks, and giving our whole craft two fearful jerks by two succeeding waves. La Mountain stuck to the boat like a hero, but lost his hat and got a dash of the waves, but soon recovered and threw over the express bag and the last remaining ballast, and said "Be easy, gentlemen; I'll have her afloat once more." In another moment we were up a few hundred feet again, and the steamer propeller Young America was taking across our track. I now proposed to swamp the boat and balloon in the lake, and trust to being picked up by the Young America, but the desire was that we should make the shore and try the land, and as we crossed the bow of the steamer they gave us a merry hurrah. La Mountain had now cut off the boat all he could, and we were within fifteen miles of the shore the gale still raging below. La Mountain might have remained in the boat below, and jumped out at the first touching the earth, and I saw no impropriety in that as then we might have had another hour or two to wait the lulling of the gale; but he said he would share our fate, and he also clambered into the basket, just as we were reaching the shore.

I saw by the swaying to and fro of the lofty trees into which we must inevitably dash that our worst perils were at hand, but I still had a blind hope that we would be saved. I ordered two men on the valve rope, and we struck within a hundred yards of the water, among some scattered trees, our hook which was of inch and quarter iron, breaking like a pipe-stem at the first catch of it in a tree, and we were hurling through the tree tops at a fearful rate.—After dashing along this way for nearly a mile, crashing and breaking down trees, we were dashed most fearfully into the boughs of a tall elm, so that the basket swung under and up the crotch of the limb, and while the boat had caught in some of the other branches, and this brought us to a little, but in another moment the Atlantic pulled up her huge proportions, and at one sweep away went the limb, basket and boat into the air a hundred feet, and I was afraid that some of the crew were impaled upon the scrags. This time, about eight inches thick at the butt and full of branches, not weighing less than six or eight hundred pounds, proved too much for the Atlantic, and it brought her suddenly down upon the top of a very tall tree and collapsed her. It was a fearful plunge, but it left us dangling between heaven and earth, in the most sorrowful looking plight of machinery that can be imagined.

None of us were seriously injured, the many cords, the strong hoop made of wood and iron, and the close wicker-work basket saving us from harm, as long as the machinery hung together, and that could not have lasted two minutes longer.

We came to the land, or rather tree, of Mr. T. O. Whitney, town of Henderson, Jefferson Co., New York.

We will have the Atlantic rebuilt for what I hope, may prove a more successful demonstration of what we propose to do on the interesting occasion.

GOLD BLOODER MURDER.

THE MURDERER ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.

Just as we were going to press we were informed by Mr. Hutchison, of this town, that a relative of his was murdered on the river Trent, on Saturday last. It appears that the murdered man was Gregory, a resident of Kenyon township, in this County, named John McDonald, aged 50 years, a lumber cruiser, and on the Saturday night about nine o'clock retired current in his room, covered upon the roof. After being awoke a few minutes by a noise, he found a man standing over him with a knife in his hand, and before he could make any resistance he was stabbed in the throat, and expired in a few minutes. The murderer then proceeded to rifle the pockets of the deceased, and after securing a sum of money, left the house. The murderer was pursued by a number of persons, and was found in the bush, where he had attempted to commit suicide by cutting his throat with a knife, but not succeeding in severing the jugular vein, he was secured and brought back to the house, where he remained until Monday morning, when he was taken to Lindsay, and lodged in the gaol there. The murderer is a native of Ireland, and has been in this country about two years. He is a married man, and has a family in Ireland. He has been employed by the deceased for some time past. The murder was committed with a large knife, which was found in the bush where the murderer had been concealed. The murderer was also found to have in his possession a watch and chain belonging to the deceased, which he had taken from his pocket. The murderer is a powerful man, and is said to be a desperate character. He has been committed to Cobourg gaol to take his trial at the next assizes.

THE POLITICAL INFLUENCE OF POETRY.

"A Poet cannot strive for despotism;
His harp falls shattered: for this still must be
The instinct of great spirits to be free,
And the unwritten Iliad of mankind,
Is, battle."
—Lever.

Mr. Editor,—We have a living faith in poetry. We believe it to be one of the most powerful agencies for the promotion of the moral elevation of a people, and second only (as regards its influence for good) to the Bible. He who has become familiar with Chaucer, Milton and Robert Nicol, &c., cannot read them without having a beneficial influence exercised upon him.

The power of poetry cannot be disputed We feel that power everywhere around us. The past, as well as the present are equally fertile in proofs. The Bards of olden time, did more to keep alive the spirit of nationality than all the political institutions of coeval date; and they did another thing, which entitles their memory to respect, they tempered that sentiment with something of love for humanity. Old John Milton, the stern republican; the enemy of tyrants; who did so much for liberty in the 18th century—and supported the commonwealth, was a poet. Read Robert Nicol, how earnest is his sympathy for humane woe; how fearless his denunciation of the wrong doer; how intense his love for the true and beautiful; and how his devotion for the cause of the poor, and the down trodden.—To his lines entitled "We are brethren a'?" chauvinism is thrown to the winds.

A happy bit hame this auld world would be
If men, when they're here, could make shift to agree
An' lik said to his neighbour, in Cottage an' ha',
"Come, gie me your hand—we are brethren A'!
My cout is a coarse one, an' yours may be fine
And I mun drink water while you may drink wine,
But we baith ha'e a leal heart unspotted to shaw,
Sae gie me your hand—we are brethren A'.

Ebenezer Elliot—"The Corn Law Rhymer" had done good service also to the cause of humanity. He would have suffered death rather than have pained even in thought the humblest of God's creatures; yet ever and anon, he gave forth utterances of fiercest indignation. His love was for the just and the good—his hatred for those who would rob the poor man of his due, and persecute his fellow. His poems teem with the noblest sentiments—in them will be found the broadest and grandest ideas of political liberty, expressed with all the fervour of his nature. He had a lofty idea of the capabilities of our nature—of what man will become if rescued from the debasing influences against which he is often found struggling. It is difficult to quote from him; for every passage tells so directly in corroboration of what we have advanced, that selection becomes impossible. Wordsworth, Charles Mackay, Graham and a host of others, furnish scarcely less powerful illustrations of the same truth—viz., that poetry has been, and is, an agency of high political, as well as moral usefulness.

We dislike all negative modes of argumentation. We cannot prove what is, by showing what is not; but having given so many instances in support of our views, we ask on the other hand where are the poets of tyranny, whose services have been given or sold, to do battle for injustice. And if there be, of what stamp or degree are they who thus forget their mission and purpose on earth. Southey almost ceased to be a poet, when he abandoned his first principles. His last works are seldom ever read, and are devoid of all that energy and enthusiasm which constitute true poetry—his case and that of one or two others form the few exceptions to our rule.

Poetry has done much for man, and ample proof of this might be given, but we cannot enlarge considering the brief limits we have in giving convincing proofs of the social and political influence of poetry.

Agricultural.

THE PROVINCIAL EXHIBITION.

The Prize List for the Fourteenth Exhibition of the Provincial Agricultural Association of Upper Canada has been issued. Notwithstanding the great depression in every branch of business throughout this Province, and the consequent possible falling off in receipts at the fair, the amount offered in prizes remains the same as last year, being the large sum of nearly $2,000 dollars. Some slight changes have, however, been made in the details of the list. The Kingston Local Committee with the active and zealous President of the Association, Wm. Ferguson, Esq., at their head, are setting to work most vigorously, and will, no doubt, have every desirable preparation made in ample time. They propose to expend some £1,500 in the improvements of the permanent Exhibition Building already existing there, and in the erection of other buildings and permanent cattle pens, and in the arrangement of the grounds. With the experience gained upon former occasions, there can be little fear that the Kingston Committee will succeed in rendering the arrangements in every respect satisfactory to visitors and the public.

The Seventh Annual Exhibition of the United States Agricultural Society will be held within the environs of Chicago, on the 19th of September.

The first show for the season of the Horticultural Society was held in Toronto last month, and was highly successful, there being a large variety of plants, flowers, and early vegetables exhibited, and all or nearly all of them in excellent condition.

THE customers of Mr. Thomas Russell, and the public in general, that they have opened a [illegible]

PHONOGRAPHY, or WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

For is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six; So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Burrow, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned orator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of "untold utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received nearly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUEL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

"THE CANADIAN PHONETIC PIONEER"

Is a Monthly Journal, devoted to the advocacy of the Reform. Price 25 cents per annum.

Manufacturers, Mechanics and Inventors.

The Scientific American
TO BE ENLARGED!

A NEW VOLUME—NEW SERIES,
TO COMMENCE ON JULY 2d, 1859.

Instead of 416 pages, the yearly volume, Enlarged Series, will contain eight hundred and thirty-two pages of valuable reading matter, useful and instructive to all classes.

THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN is published weekly in quarto form, suitable for binding, and the numbers for a single year contains information in regard to new inventions, Machinery, all branches of Manufacturing processes, Agricultural Implements, Engineering, Millwrighting, Iron Manufacture, chemistry; in fact, almost every industrial pursuit receives more or less attention in its columns.

All Patent claims officially published every week, as reported from the Patent Office; and for

INVENTORS AND PATENTEES

It contains information not to be obtained elsewhere, and which no mechanic, inventor or patentee can well do without.

As a Family Journal it has no superior for real practical utility, since in its columns will be found useful practical receipes.

Careful attention will be given, from time to time, to reports of the Metal, Lumber and other Markets.

Every number will contain sixteen pages and forty-eight columns of matter, with several illustrations of patented machines and other engravings, comprising in a single year about

SIX HUNDRED ORIGINAL ENGRAVINGS.

With the Enlarged Series is presented an opportunity to subscribe not likely to occur again for many years. It will be like commencing a new work—Vol. 1, No. 1, new Series.

Send in your subscriptions without delay, as to begin the new volume—July 2 next.

Terms $2 a Year—$1 for Six Months.

Southern, Western and Canadian money or Post Office stamps taken at par for subscriptions. Canadian subscribers will please to remit twenty-six cents extra on each year's subscription, to pre-pay postage.

A liberal discount to clubs. A prospectus giving full particulars of the inducements for clubs, with specimen copies of the paper, and a pamphlet of information concerning the procuring of Patents may be had gratis, by addressing

MISCELLANEOUS.

$100 A YEAR,

AND upwards saved to the Farmers, by ALDUS MOWRY'S

CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 12 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by case-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

PRICE $40.

All orders directed to "Mr. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.

The inventor, Aldus Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.

Selected Poetry.

RICH THOUGH POOR.

BY A. D. F. RANDOLPH.

No road of land in all the earth,
No ship upon the sea,
Nor treasures rare, nor gems, nor gold,
Do any keep for me;
As yesterday I wrought for bread,
So must I toil to-day;
Yet some are not so rich as I,
Nor I so poor as they.

On yonder tree the sunlight falls,
The robin's on the bough,
Still I can hear a merrier note
Than he is warbling now;
He's but an Arab of the sky,
And never lingers long;
but that o'errans the livelong year,
With music and with song.

Come, gather round me, little ones,
And as I sit me down,
With shouts of laughter on me place
A mimic regal crown:
Say, childless King, would I accept
Your armies and domain,
Or e'en your crown, and never feel
These tiny hands again?

There's more of honor in their touch
And blessing unto me,
Than kingdom unto kingdom joined,
Or navies on the sea:
So greater gifts to me are brought
Than Sheba's Queen did bring
To him, who at Jerusalem
Was born to be a King.

Look at my crown and then at yours,
Look is my heart and thine;
How do our jewels now compare—
The earthly and divine?
Hold up your diamonds to the light,
Emerald and amethyst;
They're nothing to those love-lit eyes,
These lips so often kissed!

Oh! noblest Roman of them all,
That mother good and wise,
Who pointed to her little ones,
The jewels of her eyes.
Four sparkle in my own to-day,
Two deck a sinless brow;
How grow my riches at the thought
Of those in glory now!

And yet no rood of all the earth,
No ships upon the sea,
No treasures rare, nor gold, nor gems,
Are safely kept for me:
Yet I am rich—myself a King?
And here is my domain;
Which only God shall take away
To give me back again!

SIX HUNDRED A YEAR.

CHAPTER I.

"Well, Dixon what is it?" asked Mr. Phogie of his assistant book-keeper, who had been patiently waiting for half an hour in the private counting-room of the merchant for an opportunity to speak with his employer.

"My second year in your service will begin to-morrow, sir; and I have taken the liberty to request your attention to a matter which, though of little consequence to you, perhaps, is of considerable moment to me."

The young man paused as if to note the effect of his words upon his employer.

"Indeed!" ejaculated the merchant, not half liking the cool and dignified way the young gentleman had of introducing himself.

To his mind there was a lack of that cringing, subservient tone and manner which his old-fashioned notions had taught him to believe was a dangerous deficiency in any clerk.

"I refer to my salary, sir."

"Well?"

"There was a gathering from the brow of the merchant.

"I have endeavoured to serve you faithfully," continued the clerk, rather discouraged by the coldness with which he was received.

There was an awkward pause. Mr. Phogie's philosophy did not permit him to speak; and the young man was too much embarrassed to proceed with his application.

"My salary for the past year has been five hundred dollars," stammered Dixon, when he found his employer was bent on holding his peace.

"Well?" said Mr. Phogie, who still provokingly refused to take a hint.

"The object of my present visit is to request you to raise it to six hundred," continued Dixon, more boldly as he began to appreciate the humor of his employer.

Mr. Phogie stared, aghast with astonishment and horror, at the supplicant. Cruikshank or Johnston would have accounted the scene quite equal to that in the workhouse, where Oliver Twist, in a less important matter, had the unheard-of presumption and impudence to "ask for more."

Dixon lost all hope.

"I trust sir, I am not unreasonable," said he, excusing his boldness.

"Forty years ago, Dixon when I was of your age," began Mr. Phogie, with solemn deliberateness, "I should have been glad to have received one half of your present salary."

The merchant looked complacently at the clerk, to note the effect of this astounding declaration.

Dixon ventured to suggest that the times had changed.

Mr. Phogie admitted it, but was quite sure the change had been for the worse.

"That is a matter of opinion, sir."

"Humph!"

"It costs more to live now than it did then."

"Young men didn't drive fast horses then, nor go to the opera; nor board at fashionable hotels," sneered Mr. Phogie.

"I am guilty of some of these follies, sir," replied Dixon, visibly indignant at the embrace-ment of the implication.

"Perhaps not; but five hundred a year is a good salary for a prudent, careful young man."

"For one who can do no better it is very well."

"Clerks are vain dogs, and over estimate themselves," said Mr. Phogie, relishing the complacent of his sarcasm.

"I do not call myself an [illegible], sir, [illegible] I consider that on five hundred dollars, [illegible] I could live comfortably, and, if you will pardon my vanity, [illegible] I think very few partners would [illegible]

Banquet of the 78th Highlanders at Bombay.

The gallant 78th, after sharing largely and most honorably in the dangers and hardships of the Persian war, and more recently in the relief of Lucknow and the suppression of the revolt in India, is now on its way home. Never did any regiment more nobly conduct itself in the field.—Everywhere they were in the front of battle, and everywhere they were victorious. They come home covered with honors, and richly enlisted to a most hearty and grateful welcome from the country whose interests they have so bravely assisted to uphold and preserve. A few days before their embarkation, the soldiers of the 78th with their wives and children, were entertained to a public banquet by the European inhabitants of Bombay. The affair as described in the Indian papers, must have been a most splendid one. Upwards of 2000 civilians, male and female, were present on the occasion. The military guests with their dependants, numbered 500 individuals. After an excellent dinner had been served up and duly partaken of, a number of toasts were proposed and most enthusiastically responded to.

Seeing the flow of the tide which led on to eloquence, says the Bombay Telegraph Mr. W. B. Tristram, of the firm of Messrs Remington & Co., mounted the rostrum, and as the representative of the European community of Bombay, thus addressed the noble regiment to whom so many hundreds had assembled to pay an honorable tribute:—

"Highlanders!—I do not intend to make a long speech, but I wish you all to bear the message I have to give you from the European inhabitants of Bombay."

"Highlanders!—This night your countrymen and countrywomen of all classes are here assembled to bid you welcome and to do you honor; and they bid me tell you how proud they feel of you, and how happy they are to see you once again. This welcome is not confined to you, but extended in its widest sense to your wives and children, from whom you have been so long parted, and to whom you are now so joyously re-united.

"Men of the 78th!—Two years since when violence, and robbery, and misrule reigned supreme, when cruelty had gorged her maw with murder, you were the men who under the leadership of the immortal Havelock and the high-souled and chivalrous Outram, were in the van of those glorious soldiers who fought in the cause of order, sound government, and British supremacy in India! And never in the annals of any country did warriors march in a more sacred contest, whether we contemplate the good you had to avenge!

"It need not that I here recount the long serious of your glorious triumphs. The whole world rings with your fame, and history will record it.

"Highlanders!—You are now homeward bound. Amid all the memories of past toil and sufferings, let this short social hour of happiness be remembered. It is offered, not as any return for your valorous deeds, but as a token of the cordial good will of all your old friends in Bombay, their sympathy in all you have gone through, and their hearty rejoicing in all the glory of your honored regiment.

"I call upon you now to drink the health of our Most Gracious Sovereign the Queen!"

The toast was of course responded to with lusty cheers. Serjeant-Major Robertson next requested his comrades in arms to fill their cups to the health of a brave and good man. He said:—

"Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen,—I beg to propose a toast which I am sure will meet with universal approval.

"There is one man of illustrious fame whom we all love—one who has led us in our thickest fights; and now that this opportunity offers I would wish to mention a few of the acts which endear him to us.—On our march to Buraipoor, when in a drenching rain, he came amongst us and spoke words of kindness, and gave the only disposable comfort at his command, a dram of spirits to cheer us, this act said more than tongue could express.

"On our return from the battle of Koosbah, he presented each man with a pair of boots gratis, and those boots, well known by us as 'Outram's served us many days of toil, and many of us would have walked bare-footed into Lucknow but for them.—After our entry into Lucknow to the relief of the beleaguered garrison, he came amongst the worn-out and spoke words of kindness, and from his own scanty supply assisted them in their distress. Again, at Alumbagh, from November till the final capture of Lucknow in March, his many acts of kindness will never be forgotten by the 78th. And last but not least, after he had been rewarded for his toils by a seat in Council, &c., he supplied our regiment with a complete library, which materially assisted to beguile many weary hours, and he also generously supplied our hospital with all the newspapers of the day, which made our sick happy and comfortable.

"Ere, then, comrades, we quit the shores of India, let us give three hearty ringing cheers (would to God that they could be borne on the western breeze to his domicile at Calcutta) for our leader in battle, our benefactor in health—the kind, the generous, the brave, the chivalrous Outram. (Immense cheering.)

"One cheer for Lady Outram; one more for the Baines—and may they follow in the footsteps of their father." (Great applause.)

Among the other toasts were "The Memory of Havelock and those who have fallen;" the "Health of Lord Clyde;" the "Healths of their Hosts and Hostesses," and various others, all of which were duly honored. During the evening the bagpipers were in frequent requisition, and "Auld Lang Syne," and other songs of Scotland were feelingly chanted. The evening passed most pleasantly away; and we doubt not that the memory of this most graceful recognition of their services will be long cherished in the brave hearts of the 78th. May their welcome home be as warm as was the farewell accorded to them when they left the Indian shore.

INHUMAN MASSACRE AT PERUGIA.

CARDINAL ANTONELLI GAVE THE ORDER —THE POPE SORRY FOR IT—WHO ARE RESPONSIBLE—THE DETOURNES WERE NOT SWISS.

[Paris Cor. London Morning Post June 16.]

Very brief accounts have reached Paris of the frightful massacre at Perugia. It was, it appears, Cardinal Antonelli who gave the orders to the Swiss to take the Town. The Pope, according to official communication, is deeply affected at what has taken place, and expressed himself in that manner to M. d'Ursel, Embassy at Rome.—A letter from Perugia was addressed to Baron [illegible] under the signature of [illegible] Charles Detournes, and in the name of [illegible] to demand an explanation of the murder of [illegible] and children.

The Opinione says:—

The horrible excesses committed at Perugia have aroused a most profound and painful sensation in Turin; and no doubt the whole of Italy and Europe will join in this sentiment. The Swiss who committed these violent and atrocious deeds were not in Perugia, but were sent there by the Roman Government, as our correspondent announced to us two days ago. The Papal Government dare not send native soldiers fearing the non-execution of such orders as they had given; but instead the mercenary Swiss were ordered there, and behaved as barbarians and not men. The accounts of that struggle are fearful indeed, and the consequences may be equally serious.

The political movement of the people of the Romagna was effected without violence. It was simply a protest against the priestly governing system. By sending a Swiss regiment to assassinate the people of Perugia, Antonelli committed a gratuitous act of cruelty which will go far to shake the temporal power of the Roman Catholic Church. We wait in Paris with anxiety for further details, hoping, for the honour of our age, that what we have learnt is at least exaggerated, but anything might be expected from the so-called "Swiss troops" of the Pope. They are mostly escaped galley slaves, the scum of the worst of all countries. Such alas! are the soldiers of Popery in 1859.

A letter from Berne says:—

"The conduct of the Swiss soldiers who were sent to put down the insurrection of Perugia has caused the greatest indignation in the heart of every right thinking man in Switzerland, and the more so as the savage acts attributed to those mercenaries have been committed by Austrians to whom the denomination of Swiss has been given.—In point of fact the two regiments known at Rome under the name of Swiss are composed of men of all nations and particularly of Southern Germans. The Swiss are a very great minority, and a number of them recently quitted the service under an idea that common cause was about to be taken with Austria. The real Swiss regiments in the service of Rome, or rather the heroic remnants of that little band who, in 1848, at Vicenza, checked the whole Austrian army, and did not capitulate until they had fired their last cartridge, were disbanded on their return to the Roman States. The present regiments are of recent formation. In 1848 the Confederation declared the old military conventions to be annuled, interdicted Swiss citizens from entering the service of a foreign country, when any one was discovered attempting to enrol recruits, both parties were severely punished. The Swiss regiments in the Service of Naples were raised in 1827 and 1829, and the old soldiers could not make up their minds in 1848 to quit a service which was their only means of existence. Several Swiss have since been recruited clandestinely, and the regiments have been completed by a great number of Germans. The Federal council will doubtless order an inquiry to be instituted into the events at Perugia, and take measures to remove, in the eyes of liberal Europe, the stain which has been cast on the Swiss name through malevolence or error."

Ferrara, Reveana, Forli, Ancona, and the other Papal States have been replaced under the authority of the Pope by the intervention of the Pontifical troops.

Screw Propellers.

In his recent work on "Naval Warfare with Steam," Sir Howard Douglas, in the clearest and most forcible manner, urged the adoption of what he conceived would be a great improvement in the screw propeller. This improvement consisted in removing the leading corners of the blades, and breaking the leading edge of each blade into its circumference by an easy curve. The first object sought by Sir Howard in making this change was that of reducing the 'shake' or vibration of the screw, and the consequent injury to the stern of the ship. These are produced, he argued, by the sudden and violent reactions of the disturbed water against the blades as they enter and emerge from the space between the two sternposts, the rectilinear edges of the ordinary screws bring in this respect highly disadvantageous, since the whole of an edge enters and leaves at once the water on each side of the aperture. But if the leading edges of a screw-blade were curved they would slide obliquely and continuously through the water, like a screw formed with an entire feather, so that at no moment would there be any shock or discontinuity of action." Further advantages which Sir Howard considered the curved edged would possess were, that they would readily throw off any floating materials that might come in contact with them—that they would not be so liable to be broken by their oblique collision with large spars as straight edges are by their direct blow—that their rounded extremities would be less liable to be hitched by ropes than the angular extremities of the common screw—and finally, that if the curved parts could be furnished with incorrodible sharp knife-edges they would divide and disentangle the screw from any rope, spar, or other floating matter with which it might become fouled. "The author would not," said Howard, "at the sacrifice of speed, revert to a continuous leather screw, but the form here recommended would to a considerable extent gain the proposed ends." Now, in justice to an able and veterian officer—an officer who by his incomparable writings on naval and military science, has commanded the profound admiration and respect of both services—we revive these passages of his latest work, and couple with them a reference to those remarkable experiments the results of which were recorded in our last week's impression. Those experiments show—if the report which is before us may be trusted—that the improvement recommended by Sir Howard does actually accomplish his first and principal object by reducing the vibration or shake of the screw, as he predicted.—They also show that it has the further important effect of improving both the speed and steerage of the ship. The reporter tells us that "the first trial with the Admiralty screw was with a diameter of 18 feet, her speed being 11.823 knots. On the second trial, with the diameter increased to twenty feet, the speed realized was 11.336 knots with a great increase of vibration. On the 3rd trial the leading corner of each blade was cut off, and in this form the common screw attained its greatest speed, giving a result of 12.032 knots. On the fourth trial both the corners of each blade were cut off, when with a greater number of revolutions, less speed was made, being 12.012 knots. In last trial, with the "following" corner of each blade cut off, but the screw restored to its perfect form in every other respect, gave a result of 11.815 knots. The reporter also says, "The leading edge of the former is the part that mostly affects the steerage of the ship, and also causes the greater part of the vibration." We deem ourselves to have been entirely [illegible] to call Providence's attention to [illegible] to [illegible] to [illegible]

MILANESE ENTHUSIASM.

The Milanese have not yet got over their enthusiasm and joy at the deliverance from their oppressors; at least if it has calmed down a little, their outward demonstrations are scarcely diminished. The streets are still gaudy with banners, floating from innumerable windows. It is a blaze of green, white, and red. In some places the French tri-colour is combined with the Italian, either by an additional stripe of blue, or by blue ribands fixed at the end of the flagstaff and blending with the other colours as they flutter in the breze. Many of the flags, but certainly only a minority, have the Savoy cross in the centre. There is a perfect rage for the four colours, and if their lavish display sufficed to secure tranquility, moderation, and good government, the future freedom, prosperity, and happiness of Lombardy might be considered safe. They are worn by nearly everybody, either in hat or button-hole; a few days ago I might have said by every body, but one meets a few who have laid them aside, and they will be longest adhered to, a Milanese yesterday assured me, by those who think it possible, that their devotion to the new order of things may be doubted. At present they are still displayed by ninety-nine persons out of 100, and in every possible form.—Some content themselves with twisting a scrap of ribband through their button-hole, others wear stars, or cockades, or rosets affixed to coat or hat, or a nosegay of artificial colours combining the prescribed tints or three or four tassels, or a small plume dyed tricolour, or a watchguard or cravat of the beloved red, white, and green. The shops are full of the insignia and colours of this new decoration of the Order of Italian Independence. The mercers and milliners display such quantities of merchandise of the popular hues that it seems incredible there should have been time to get the tissues dyed. In the centre of the tricoloured silk handkerchief one sees magnificent portraits of Napoleon, Victor Emmanuel, Garibaldi, and other popular men of the day, and heroes of the Italian cause. Tricoloured bracelets are made of beads and bars of stained ivory or bone. There is, in you may suppose, fine opportunity for the ladies to give proof of their skill in decorative patriotism. In every possible way do they contrive to interweave the ubiquitous colours with their apparel. Some content themselves with pinning a riband star upon their left breast; and I am not sure if these be not the more judicious, for the tricolour does not suit every complexion. A white bonnet, with a profusion of blue berries, green flowers, and red ribands, is rather trying to some physiognomies; and of such one sees numbers. The more credit is due to the pretty Milanese for thus sacrificing the becoming to the patriotic. From the highest places to the lowest the beloved badge is introduced.—It floats, I need hardly say, from the topmost pinnacle of Milan's magnificent cathedral. A tawny little girl, the attendant on a couple of itinerant musicians, came collecting coppers last evening from the persons sitting outside a cafe. She too would not be behind the times and her begging-box fresh painted, was gay with the triple tint.

When is a lover like a tailor?—When he presses his suit.

How Hard they Take it.—A young lady was a friend married recently, and the mother of her husband being in very poor health, she was taken immediately home by her legs lord to nurse and take care of the "old folks." In the course of a few months the mother was removed by death. The dutiful and sympathising daughter-in-law thus expressed her grief at this event, to a company of her neighbors, who called in to take tea with her on an afternoon soon after their sad bereavement. "Oh, dear!" said she, "how much I miss my poor dear mother! Why it seems to me I can hear her now, just as she used to sit at the breakfast-table, reaching out her fork for the last potato!"

Garibaldi's Son.—Garibaldi is accompanied by a bestage to fortune in his campaign—his son, a handsome, intelligent lad of eight en, the son of Anita, his brave and true-hearted Brazilian wife, who followed him through good and evil fortune, and died at last by his side. This youth has absorbed the very life of Garibaldi. The lad should be interesting to England, for his education has been wholly English, the foundation of Miss Jessie White's interest in Italian independence having been laid as governess to this very son of Garibaldi's At that time the sympathies of the chief were all with England, and he sought an English education for the child. This was found in Miss Jessie White, who accepted the situation with all its responsibilities and obligations, and fulfilled it to the admiration of all. Young Garibaldi speaks English without the smallest foreign accent, and is well acquainted with English literature and laws—and even in appearance he is said so greatly to resemble a rowing, cricketing, larking, Eton boy, as frequently to have deceived the English sailors visiting his father's island.

DREADFUL EARTHQUAKE AT ERZEROUM.

A letter from Constantinople of the 15th says:—Erzeroum was well nigh destroyed by an earthquake on the 2nd inst. At half past ten o'clock, a. m., apparently without any warning, and while people were engaged in their ordinary pursuits, a shock was felt, which in the space of sixteen seconds, destroyed almost every building of importance in the town; mosques, churches, barracks, prisons, khans, and bazaars, are either heaps of ruins or in such a state as to make it dangerous to approach them. After the first great commotion nothing of a serious nature had occurred up to three o'clock the afternoon of the following day, when the courier left; but there had been a continuation of those vibrations which every one who has lived in countries subject to volcanic action must have experienced in a greater or less degree.

It is sufficiently disagreeable to feel the tremulous motion of even a distant eruption when the house seems to undergo a spasm, the windows, and doors rattle in their frames. No wonder, then, that the scene in the neighbourhood of the destroyed city should up to the latest hour of our intelligence, have been one of indescribable terror and confusion. Every living creature had left the town, all the inhabitants that escaped being encamped on the plain of Caratc. The loss of human life is variously estimated, the most extravagant statements prevailing; but I fear there is good reason to believe that 600 or 700 people have perished. The English, French, and Austrian Consulates have also been destroyed or rendered unfit for further occupation.

Queen Victoria and the Canadian Guests.

The interesting event of the deputation from Canada came off on the 25th, when her Majesty was graciously pleased to receive the deputation, consisting of Lieut.-Colonel Irvine, the Hon. Henry Smith, Speaker of the Commons of Canada, Mr. Langevin, Solicitor-General, Mr. Connell and Lieut.-Colonel Rubidge, to her commands, previous to the general reception, when the Speaker presented the following address, with which her Majesty expressed herself much pleased, saying "I am much pleased to receive this address from my Canadian subjects." The deputation was introduced by the Duke of Newcastle, assisted by the Lord Chamberlain.

The address was as follows:—"To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty!—Most Gracious Sovereign,—We, your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Council and Commons of Canada, in Provincial Parliament assembled, humbly approach your Majesty with renewed assurance of devotion and attachment to your royal person and Government. We have long hoped that your Majesty would be graciously pleased to honour with your presence your Majesty's subjects in British North America, and to receive the personal tribute of our unwavering attachment to your rule, and we trust that, while your Majesty's presence would still more closely unite the bonds which attach the province to the empire, it would gratify your Majesty to witness the progress and prosperity of this distant part of your dominions. The completion, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty, of the Victoria bridge, the most gigantic work of modern days, would afford to your Majesty a fitting occasion to judge of the importance of your province of Canada, while it would assure to its inhabitants the opportunity of uniting in their expressions of loyalty and attachment to the throne and empire. We, therefore, most humbly pray that your Majesty will graciously deign to be present at the opening of the Victoria Bridge, accompanied by your royal Consort, and such members of your Majesty's august family as it may please your Majesty to select to attend you on the occasion."

MURDER NEAR NEWARK.

The body of Mr. Charles Robinson of this city, who has been missing since Monday, was found this morning in a field belonging to Mr. Josiah L. Baldwin, adjoining the grounds on which the Roman Catholic pic-nic was held on the 4th, on the Irvington plankroad, just beyond the city limits. Mr. R. was foreman in the tannery establishment of Messrs. Halsey and Tucker. He went to work for sometime on the morning of the 4th, and at 3 p. m. left his residence, No. 262 Washington Street, saying that he would go to the tannery.—Not returning as usual his family became distressed, and a search was made for him. The vats, pools, &c., in the tannery were examined to see if by accident he had fallen into one of them and was drowned.

Nothing could be found of him, nor even were there any trace of his whereabouts till yesterday noon, when a man who works for Messrs. Halsey & Tucker, said he had seen him at six o'clock on Monday afternoon at the pic-nic, where he spoke to him, and he appeared to be in his usual condition. Parties were dispatched to the place, but after hunting over the grounds could not find him. This morning some men employed by Mr. Baldwin on going out to mow, found the body lying in the grass, near a heap of brush, covered with blood. A knife was found near the body, but it was closed and had not been used. A trunk which Mr. R. wore was also found near, having been torn off his body.

The remains were brought to this city, and a post mortem examination made by Drs. Grant and Cross. They found one wound on the gullet, two behind the right ear, and a contusion on the left ear.—The wounds on the gullet and behind the right ear had been produced either by a blow from a stone or club, and the contusion by a fall. His face was covered with blood from these wounds, and also from his nose. Other bruises were found on his body.

It is unknown how Mr. R. came where he was found, or how he could have met his death. In one of his pockets was found a portmonnaie, containing a few memoranda, but no money. Nothing else was found though he was known to have carried a watch. The body must have undoubtedly been robbed, either by the assailants of Mr. R. or by some person afterward. It is not known that he had an enemy, though we are informed to-day that a man had a grudge against him, and that he said he would be revenged.

He was highly esteemed by his employers, for whom he had worked twelve years, during which time he had never been known to do a wrong action. He was somewhat eccentric in his manner, and for a few days had complained of a distress in the head, producing slight derangement.

The deceased was an unoffending, quite citizen, of strictly temperate habits and correct life. The whole affair is shrouded in mystery. Mr. R. has a wife and child. He was forty-eight years old.

Coroner Benjamin took charge of the body, and was to hold an inquest at three o'clock.—Newark Advertiser, July 6.

SUICIDE IN MONTREAL.

A young man a German, committed suicide this morning early, at the St. Nichols Hotel, Jacques Cartier Square, by shooting himself. The particulars of the case as we gather them, are as follows. On Friday last this young man, who is apparently 25 years of age, called at the boarding house of Mrs. M'Leish, Craig Street, giving his name as Christian Lauck, and stating that he had just arrived from New York, and desired board. He was accomodated and continued to reside there up till last evening. To his fellow boarders it was evident there was something praying on his mind for he was constantly nervous, and agitated, while at the same time, he was dejected, often exclaiming "that if he told them what was the matter with him, they would not believe him." He yesterday took tea at his boarding-house, and having dressed himself he did not return. About 11 o'clock last night he entered the St. Nicholas Hotel, and requested he could be accomodated with a bed. Having been answered in the affirmative, and requested to enter his name on the register, he stepped up and with a trembling hand, wrote "Hauffman, Montreal." The book-keeper, noticing that his place of residence was Montreal, —asked him how it was that he came there —why not go home?—to which he made reply that he had lost his boy and could not get in. He seemed at that time very nervous. Having paid 25 cents for a bed, he was shown to his room. About half-past five o'clock this morning the inmates heard the report of a pistol, and on the proprietor and the porter attempting to open the door of the room occupied by Hauffman, they found it locked, and on failing to gain admission, forced it open, when he was found lying on his back, with his head towards the door, and a small pocket pistol laying at his side. He was quite dead. The Coroner was immediately notified, and on going to the spot examined the clothes of the deceased; on him was found $60, principally in $20 gold pieces, and bills of the New York Bank of the denomination of $3; also a silver watch, a few pennies around which was wrapped, a paper having the name of Dr. Higgins on it. The Coroner at once called upon Dr. H. who, on arriving at the spot identified the body as that of a young man who called upon him last Tuesday morning, complaining of an eruption that was out on his body, which the Doctor assured him was of no consequence. He apparently left satisfied; but in the evening returned in a state of excitement, stating that there was a universal conspiracy to poison him, and that the eruption then on his body was caused by some poison that was given him. The Doctor believing he was insane at that point, said he could give him an antidote, wherupon he appeared greatly rejoiced. He left, taking with him some powders. On his person was also found a letter in which he stated that ever since 1851 there had been a conspiracy to poison him, and that poison had been administered to him since his arrival in Montreal; also that he did not take the powders given him by Dr. Hingston, because he believed that they were poisonous. A post mortem examination was made. The ball entered about two inches below the nipple, passing in at the apex of the heart coming out an inch and a half higher up, and lodging against the ribs, near the vertabræ. Death was instantaneous. A Jury was impannelled, Mr. L. C. de Lorimier, of St Hyacinthe, being foreman. There seems to be something strange in this case; among quite a number, this forenoon, the opinion was freely expressed that there were circumstances which, in some way, however slight or remote, seemed to point to his being the murderer of a man at Newark, N. J., about two weeks ago. True it is that a man named Peter Miller, a German, was stabbed and killed at a pic-nic in Newark, about the first of the month, by a young German named Hauffman, who immediately fled to Canada. We trust that everything will be done to fully clear up the mystery.—Pilot.

Church of England Synod at Quebec.

At a meeting held on Thursday last, it was moved by the Rev. Dr. Falloon, seconded by G. O. Stuart, Esquire:—

That an Act having been passed by the Provincial Legislature an sanctioned by Her Majesty the Queen, entitled "An Act to enable the members of the United Church of England and Ireland in Canada to meet in Synod," the said Act being the 19th and 20th Victoria, ch. 141; and also another Act to explain and mend the same, being the 22nd Vict. ch. 139, by which Acts the Bishops of the several Dioceses in Canada have authority to frame Constitutions, and make Regulations for their own order and government,—the Lord Bishop of this Diocese, having now summoned the Clergy and Lay Delegates of the several Parishes and Missions, chosen according to the directions in the said Acts, for the purpose of taking action under the provisions of the same: We the Bishop, Clergy, and Lay Delegates now assembled, do hereby accept the said Acts, and declare ourselves a Synod for the Diocese of Quebec, and will proceed to the consideration of the Constitution and Regulations to be adopted for due order of the same;—no rule, cannon, law or regulations to be in force in this Diocese as the act of this Synod, unless it shall have received the concurrent assent of the Bishop, the Clergy, and the Lay Delegates; the assent of the Clergy and the Lay Delegates to be determined by a majority of votes, the same to be taken separately, in each order, whenever it shall be so required.

Moved in amendment by Mr. H. Scott, seconded by Mr. Lannigan:

That all the words after the word "that" in original motion, be struck out, and the following therefor:—No cannon resolution or proceeding of the Synod to be in force in this Diocese, unless adopted by a majority of the Clergy and of the Lay Delegates provided that if any measure so passed be objected to by the Bishop, such measure shall stand reserved for reconsideration; and if again in like manner adopted at the next session of the Synod the same shall become law.

Lost by a majority of 105, the division being—Yeas 37; 3 Clergy, 34 Laity.—Nays 142; 36 Clergy, 106 Laity.

Mr. George Hall, seconded by Mr. H. M. Patton again moved in amendment:

That the following words be added to the original motion:—Provided that the power of staying any measure passed by a concurrent majority of the Clergy and the Lay Delegates shall be limited to the present Bishop.

That amendment was also negatived on a division. Yeas 37; Nays 142.

The original motion was then carried on the same division.

The first Article on the proposed Constitution of the Synod was then submitted by Mr. J. B. Forsyth, as follows:—

ARTICLE 1.—The Synod shall consist of the Bishop of the Diocese, of the Clergy of the same, and of Lay representatives to be elected as hereinafter provided; and no act or resolution of the Synod shall be valid unless it shall receive the concurrence of the Bishop and of the majority of the Clergy and Laity present and voting at the meeting.

The Article was carried by a majority of 109, viz:—Yeas, 146,—37 Clergy, 109 Laity; Nays, 37,—3 Clergy, 34 Laity.

RELIGION AND MAMMON.

We would rather represent the poor publican that went up into the corner of the temple and smote his breast and asked for mercy, than the ostentatious Pharasee with many prayers. We do not often therefore dilate on our creed, or parade our faith, but there are times and circumstances when it is necessary to refer to sacred matters. It is universally acknowledged that nothing is so important and valuable to a community as true religion, but then there is nothing more deleterious than false religion. Now is it sufficient that the ministers of a self-denying religion should be good, but it is necessary that they should appear so. Example is so much more potent than precept it is so much more effective to say, "Come follow," than to say, "Go" when dangers are to be braved, and difficulties overcome that it is necessary that the clergy should be as meek, humble, pure, and self-denying as they exhort their flocks to be. There are many such in the Church of England, and in every denomination of Christians; but there are also self-seekers and hypocrites, and these it is our duty to expose and drive from out the fold. Inordinate wealth certainly seems incompatible with a real profession of the Gospel; and though it is no crime to be born to a fortune, and no sin to have the goods of fortune flow into you, yet there is nothing more perilous than riches, and no responsibility greater than the disposition of them. So much has it been considered incompatible to mix riches and profess the holy ministry, that the law of this, and most countries, makes the two incompatable. Wherefore, it is not lawful for a clergyman to deal in worldly affairs, how much more unlawful is it to deal and traffic in church affairs. Yet we fear this is done every day; and a very notorious case has just been brought before the public. A correspondent to a contemporary has given the following account of a queer case of plurality in church livings. The biography of the individual will no doubt remind the most of one of the Apostles:—

The time of the great War Middle Pitt, the Reverend George Pragnell, was made Bishop of Lincoln in 1787, and afterwards was translated to the richer Bishopric of Winchester. In addition to this professional fortune, a rich man of the name of Tomline made him his heir, and having then peculiarly been blessed in worldly matters, he was gathered to his fathers, died immensely rich, and was interred in the cathedral of which he was the bishop. It would be supposed that having been thus doubly blessed, he would with a thankful heart and contented mind, have provided for his family out of the ample means thus bestowed upon him. A truly Christian mind would not have failed to do so. The bishop, however, was of another mind, and bringing up two of his sons to a profession so profitable to him, he proceeds to quarter them on that church that is obliged to have large subscriptions to support the orphans of its members, and that is daily said to be too scanty for the spiritual wants of the community. We have no particulars of the career of his elder son, but of the second we have this account of his promotion by his father the bishop. In 1814 he was made Chancellor of Lincoln, with a perpetual curateship of £1,800 a year; shortly after or at the same time, prebend of Stroke, with somewhere about £400 a-year; also prebend of Biggleswade, with the impropriatorship of the large tithes; he was also made rector of Wheathampstead, with the curacy of Harpenden, Hertfordshire, value £1,356 yearly; in 1817, the rectory of Chalfont, in Bucks, £615 yearly; and in 1825, £913 more was added as canon or prebendary of Winchester Cathedral. This self-denying follower of Christ had two rectory residences and also assigned houses at Lincoln and Winchester, at each of which he resided three months in the year. In addition, and worst of all, he was sinecurist chaplain to a charity called St. Leonard's Hospital, at Newark, which had 360 acres of land, and forty houses in Newark, the entire revenue of which was thus appropriated—£13 8s yearly with a coat, waistcoat, and a supply of coals, to three alms people, and the remainder to the chaplain.

We are not prepared to say that the reverend gentleman held all these preferments at once, though it seems to be stated as if he had. Of course he also inherited largely from his father, the Bishop who died very rich, and it is no wonder, therefore, the subject of our notice was esteemed a Crœsus at Lincoln. We will not follow up the history of these Pretymans, although there are various proofs given of their having benefited by the Church to an enormous extent; and our contemporary makes out that this humble follower of the Gospel must altogether have had £212,000 from that Church which is so often appealing to the public, and which has so many worthy and working clergy who can scarcely get income enough to make the decent appearance their holy calling demands. Verily, as the case we have cited is only one of the Church, as well as the State, wants a Second Reformation.

REMARKABLE SUICIDE OF A LEADER IN THE METHODIST CHURCH.

A Tennessee correspondent of the Christian Advocate gives a detailed account of the suicide of Mr. Wm. B. Norton, a distinguished leader in the Methodist Church, in Williamson County, Tennessee. For a year past Mr. Morton has been a sufferer from disease of the liver, and became a monomaniac, dreading a reverse of fortune. In May last he endeavored to commit suicide but was prevented by his wife from committing the deed. The Advocate's correspondent writes:

"On the 16th of May 1859, his wife discovered him at the bureau writing, after which he folded the writing up and put it into his pocket-book, took a razor out of the drawer, unobserved by her, and put it in his pocket; then coming to his wife, he told her he was obliged to die, and must take his own life; told her farewell and offered her his hand, but she would not take it, and clasping him in her arms, followed him to the yard gate with such shrieks and cries that his emotions were touched, and he returned with her to the house, and putting the razor in the drawer, took from his pocket-book the paper and gave it to her, upon which the following was written:

"The act that I shall commit is rash, but I am desperate, and cannot avoid it.—My wife is kind and agreeable, and as good to my little girl as if she was her own child. I am roused in my feelings and prefer to be no more.

W. B. MORTON."

May, 16th day, 1859."

His wife took the paper, and for fear of future accomplishment of his purpose, kept it. She reasoned with him in such strains of sympathy, that he told her he would never make another attempt of the sort, and pleaded with her until she promised that she would never reveal the attempt he had just made, provided he would never make another.

On Monday, June 6th, he went to Franklin, and obtained an order of court to pay out a large sum of money to the heirs of an estate of which he had control.

On Tuesday, he paid out a part of the money, after which he put up some tombstones over the graves of his 2 former wives, and then returned home. Reaching home he told his wife he had been several places along the road that would have been good places, but did not say for what. The next morning before he arose, he said to his wife, "If anything does happen, I want you to keep Fannie," alluding to his little girl.

On Wednesday, June 8, he put his hat on, and went off to an old house which stood near the public road, about one quarter of a mile from his dwelling, and in plain view of the door. He remained there a short time and returned home, but soon went back to the old house and entered it. In a few minutes a man passed along the road, and he came out and talked with him. He then went to the field and gave his negroes some general directions about business; and while he was there they discovered a rope in his pocket. He passed on to the barn-yard, and went two or three times from one barn to the other. Finally, he came to the house, and, as he entered the door, took up his little girl and hugged and kissed her; then went to his wife, knelt down by her side and threw his arms around her neck and kissed her several times, telling her he did not want to leave her, but was compelled to do so; told her he was a [illegible] but she was not the cause [illegible] that she had been a devoted wife and [illegible] wife.

He said that in his regular devotions he could not pray as he formerly had done, and that this would find out all its charges for him. He arose and went to the bureau got his will and read it over privately after which, he called it up, and offering it to his wife, said "If anything should happen to me, will you give this to 'Squire Boyd?" She refused to take it, but said he might "Squire Boyd would get it, if it became necessary. She [illegible] the matter, and told his wife to obtain a [illegible] that part belonged to some poor, [illegible] and that seventy dollars was to pay what he owed [illegible] borrowed from her. Then, with her eyes resting full upon him, he took a razor from the drawer, put it in his pocket, and, grasping her by the hand, bade her a final farewell; told her his breath was short and he was obliged to die. He started, with her swinging to his body, but eluded her grasp at the door, and ran violently down the hill to a barn, which was a few yards away, with his hands circling above his head like a madman, falling to the ground twice as he ran, but arising and staggering his way until he entered the barn. His wife gave the alarm, and the servants from the field and the yard were soon at the barn, but too late. He was there, but wounded and dead—a ghastly victim of insanity and self-destruction, both jugular veins, the windpipe and leaders cut through, square across to the neck-bone. Clenched in his right hand was the bloody razor, and in the left was the short end of the razor case. He had evidently reached the barn, and was standing still and erect when the first effort was made, which only gave an incision through the skin; then, with a bloody hand from that wound, raised his hat, threw back his head, and gave the second, a fearful and fatal stroke, which filled his shoes and covered the floor around with smoking blood, in which he was found upon his face, dead.

STEAM TRAFFIC WITH AMERICA

The English and American steamers now running from North America to France and England, are crowded with passengers, because this is the season for the Americans to visit Europe, but these steamers do not load so well with passengers on their return voyages. The North Atlantic steamers, on the contrary, which touch at Bremen or Hamburg, carry more passengers from Europe to the United States than they convey on the Eastern voyages. These passengers are chiefly Germans, and the war between France and Austria appears to be hurrying people out of Germany and preventing Germans in the United States from revisiting Europe. As yet the war has occasioned scarcely any falling off in the goods traffic between Europe and North America. Twenty-two large steamers reached North America from Europe during the last month, every one of which started from or touched at, some English port, and they could not have carried less than 15,000 tons of cargo and 5,000 passengers to America. Nearly as many steamers reached England from North America during last month, and they brought over an immense number of passengers and vast quantities of the precious metals. The cargo taken by these steamers consists of the most valuable kind of goods. The numerous steamers running from Liverpol to North America are found inadequate for the traffic of London and Manchester, and large quantities of bale and other goods from those places are forwarded to Southampton by rail to be conveyed to New York by the Hamburg and Bremen screw steamers which touch at Southampton. It is highly probable that in another year or so steamers will be running to and from Liverpool, Southampton, Glasgow, or Galway and North America daily during a greater part of the year. The trade with South America is also increasing. The merchants of London, Manchester, and even of Paris and Havre, have memoralized the British Government to double the mail communication between this country and Brazil, and the Royal Mail Company have put on their large screw steamer Tasmanian on the Brazil passage in consequence of the increasing traffic on that line. But it is not only between England and North and South America that commerce is increasing, but also between this country and Central America. In less than two months the five giant steamers of the Royal Mail Company—the Parmatta, Atrato, Parana, Shannon and La Plata—will run every fortnight between Southampton and the eastern terminus of the Panama railroad, to meet the increasing traffic with Central America, the highway now to the Pacific, and the Western Coast of America. This traffic will be very considerably augmented when the Panama railway forms a portion of the mail route between England and Australia, which will shortly be the case.—European Times.

THE LAST OF A GREAT SCANDAL.

We are credibly informed from various sources, that the Hon. Daniel E. Sickles has become entirely reconciled with his wife, and is now living with her in marital relations as before the death of Philip Barton Key. We are also assured that in taking this remarkable step, Mr. Sickles has alienated himself from most if not all of those personal and political friends who devotedly adhered to him during his recent imprisonment and trial. The reconciliation between Mr. and Mrs. Sickles was consumated, as we are informed, while Mr. Sickles was residing at the house of a friend on the Bloomingdale Road, about half a mile from the former house of Mr. Sickles, which for some time past Mrs. Sickles, has occupied, either alone or with some of the members of her own family. The suspicions of his host were excited by the repeated absence of Mr. Sickles at unusual hours; and when he came in one morning very early he was interrogated by the host and another friend who was present, and on positively denying their right to question him, and refusing to give an explanation, they shook hands with him for the last time and he withdrew. It is said he has since addressed letters to his former intimate associates, notifying them formally of the resumption of conjugal relations between himself and Mrs Sickles.—New York Tribune.

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

OUR MARKET BY-LAW.

Dear Sir,—Some time ago a Committee of the Town Council, solicited the opinions of the merchants of the Town, upon the working of the Market By-law, for the purpose, it was thought, of improving the Market regulations.

It was supposed by some persons that as the question was of importance, and one which was engaging the public mind to a considerable extent, some further information would have been given to the inhabitants beyond the few remarks of the Review and the bare report of the Committee as submitted to the Council. I think, Mr. Editor, that the publication of the replies to the queries of the committee, would be interesting to your readers; and, as the opinions were publicly expressed, the writers would not object to your printing them.

There is one clause of the report of the Committee that I cannot pass over without remark. It is as much for the substantial good of the commercial men of the prosperous town of Perry Hill, and the interest thereon, ($1,200 per annum), and the purpose to be derived from the [illegible] I confess if gentlemen did not chuckle at its [illegible] and cunning:—

"Of those circulars 36 were issued, and "17 replies received. The 19 who did "not reply, your committee feel justified in "assuming as favorable to the present By-"law, as had any inconveniences been felt "from it, they would in all likelihood have "made it known."

If the Committee had searched the Clerk's office, they would have found protests of the merchants, strongly set forth against the objectionable clauses of the By-law, and as these protests never received the slightest attention from gentlemen, was it to be supposed that if they had against objected to the By-law, so far as it related to mercantile operations, it would have had the slightest effect on the minds of the Committee? I think I may safely say it would not. I can tell the Committee that the gentlemen who did not reply to the circular are not in favor of the By-law in its present shape, and the Committee notwithstanding their report, know this to be the case.

With regard to this famous By-law I shall say nothing further here, than that I imagine the gentlemen who instituted it, and who so perseveringly maintain it, if they are not very obtuse in their vision, must begin to see that they have overstepped the mark, and that the object they had in view will not be obtained by the course they are pursuing; and if I am not mistaken they will yet have to repeal some of its objectionable clauses, or abandon it altogether. The trade of the town and country cannot be sacrificed to sectional interests, or by the experiments of a few gentlemen without business experience, and who so glaringly manifest their own selfishness. These remarks may seem unpleasant, but there are many persons who believe in their correctness nevertheless; and even go further and say, that if some of the supporters of this measure had not some personal end in view, they would not have gone into the Council at all.

I may again trouble you to describe the enormous supplies of produce, vegetables, poultry, butter, eggs, &c., which are daily exhibited in the market, and the very low prices for which these commodities can be obtained—and how the "green grocers" are being ruined—and how anxious the respectable farmers wives are to rush to the market and take up their stand there, and almost bug Mr. Cathcart for very love as chief administrator of this their darling By-law. But I am trespassing upon your space and must close.

Yours,
POSTULATA.

Thoughts on a few subjects.

Mr. Editor—A low moral sense is the usual concomitant of bad and erroneous teaching or example; and when parents or the press give countenance to any sin, the law exerts but a feeble influence in the way of Reform. How much of the evil that is seen every day around us, arises from the neglect of parents, or from the press giving utterance to things which for the sake of humanity it were better had never seen the light. It is this which encourages the profane in his irreverend use of the name of God; and fills the tavern and the brothel with their victims. Legislators steal the public money by thousands and go unpunished—should we marvel then, if fraud is daily becoming more common amongst us, and when many who would scorn what they call "meanness" are yet daily found pilfering from others legally, whenever they find it their interest to do so.

The basis of all past legislation has been erroneous; it has aimed at eradicating, instead of beneficially directing human instinct and passion. The influence of moisture, soil, heat &c., has been carefully studied. Man alone has been made an exception to the general rule in the adaptation of means to ends, and his condition morally is a sufficient commentary on the wisdom of the exclusion.

A "church member" becomes an Editor—apart from the press he is a consistent advocate of the "golden rule" but in his editorial capacity as "Rev'd functionary," applies to his own use the public money he turns over a "new leaf" and appologises for what in his individual capacity he would have condemned. How true the reply of the pirate to Alexander the Great, "I am called a robber because I command one small vessel; while you are called a conqueror because you command great fleets and armies."

Again some editors apart from their offices [I mean church members] on a Sabbath morning teach a class in the Sabbath School, and then and there instruct them in the duties of religion, but on Friday morning his "Little sheet" comes out, and in the "Budget of Fun," appears an item, beginning with "Who made you, enquired a lady teacher of a lubberly boy," &c., &c. What a commentary is this on the Sabbath day's profession.

Again when Mr. Longpurse in a coffee room or a bar room, stigmatizes Mr. Threadbare as totally ignorant of grammar, Mr. Threadbare being of a somewhat choleric temper, answers warmly and declares that Mr. Longpurse knows nothing at all about it. Mr. Longpurse settles the matter triumphantly by offering to bet Mr. Threadbare more pounds than he [Threadbare] has shillings. That of course settles the matter, and as Longpurse with a smile of superiority looks around, Messrs. Lateout & Strongale, who sometimes drink at Longpurse's expense ingeniously nod their craniums and ask what he has to say to that and of course poor Threadbare has nothing to say. He can't make the wager, and does not like to avow his poverty, and thus Mr. Longpurse gains the day.

Otonabee, July 18th, 1859.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—The Council of Asphodel has at last thought proper to abandon the Old Lady's bar-room, and has removed to the contemptible village of Norwood. The members like Royal Brothers, took their seats on the 13th of July in the Town Hall. They take refreshments at the International Hotel where the best liquors of the day are to be procured, and the Host makes himself remarkably agreeable. But sir, they have an unhealthy appearance, their stomachs are as foul as they were last January, and it appears that the healthcare disease they labour under cannot be cured by lawyers. Had they at once applied to T. Tomkinty the Indian Herb Doctor, and procured medicine from Nature's garden they would have had clean stomachs and pure blood and their machinaries in perfect order to day. Councillor Harrison says that Longpurse Dominion's pills were composed of the right material and had a most glorious effect; they acted as Chloroform on Mr. Wilcox, as an emetic on J. Foley Esq., the old Clerk of eight years standing, and they purged the Council of her campers and are now physicking the Treasurer at a fearful rate. The Society was refused the other day with a distant rebuke of Home and within labouring under the influence made each before J. B. Tweddle, Commissioner, that a paltry request was due to the Constable who served the writs, which he sent to the judge at Toronto to see if it would take effect on the defeated Councillors or the said party as they are now more particulary known by that name.

Yours, &c.,
A RATEPAYER.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

Dear Sir,

The members of three Lodges of the Loyal Orange Association, met at Norwood on the 12th of July.

The celebration was numerously attended. They assembled at 12 o'clock on Mount Orange in the Grove, where the Rev. Mr. McDowal delivered them an eloquent sermon appropriate for the occasion, after which they retired to W. Scott's Hotel, where they partook of refreshments.

They retired at an early hour, gave three cheers for the "Queen," and left for their respective homes in perfect order.

Yours, &c.,
AN OBSERVER.

Spare the Owls and save your Wheat.

The following letter in favor of the Barn Owl, recently appeared in the London Times :—

Sir,—In your impression of the 9th inst., I observe a capable letter headed "An Owl's Leather," from Mr. Ellis, of Leicestershire, who, I make no doubt, is a benign gentleman, from his advocating the cause of a valuable and much persecuted bird, viz: the white or barn owl. Many sportsmen give out indiscriminate order to their keepers to destroy all vermin but the fox, and among them (in many cases in the ignorance of both) the poor owl is ranked. The consequence is, in some districts they are nearly extinct, and where this is the case the stacks and barns swarm with mice. Last summer I witnessed the getting in of a small stack of wheat in Shropshire, which the owner supposed would yield enough for his family, of wife and three servants, for eight or nine months. All that he got from it fit to send to the mill was four and a half bushels. Four hundred mice were killed and as many more we suppose, escaped.—These animals, as well as young rats, require vegetation and water. At dusk they come out, and out at the same time comes the owl. No doubt they were created by an all-wise Providence to keep these vermin under, as the rook is for the destruction of the wire-worm, and the toad for slugs. If it were not so we should be eaten up. They know by instinct how to go about their calling better than we do. If the rook and owl do pilfer a little at times when pinched by hunger, the laborer must have his hire; and with all our sagacity we cannot master them like they can. The cat kills more game in a season than the owl in his lifetime, and the farmer with salt and chemicals which cost him a good deal of money, cannot keep the wire-worm out of his land.—In former days, in the country, they had the "owlet" hole in their barns as regularly as the pitching hole, for his ingress and egress, many of which I find are stopped up. During five summers in the vicinity I have mentioned, I have only seen one owl skimming the meadows at nightfall. This year an unfortunate one flew over the cricket ground at dusk one evening, when the first thing that occurred to a young sportsman' was to fetch his gun and shoot him. This is being worse than people we call barbarians, for in India they religiously, and by law, protect two useful birds—the Brahmin kite and the adjutant. In Barbary the stock is safe, where they say.—"On the houses they chase for their nest no evil cometh."

THE AUSTRIAN WHEAT.—This variety of wheat is evidently a very prolific kind. In several cases where we have noticed some large heads, we have counted 96 and 100 grains in a single spike. The head is regular in shape almost like barley, four-sided long, with the grains closely and compactly set one against another. There is no wheat that has a stronger growth of straw. Of its ability to resist the fly we are as yet unable to speak. We notice, however, that in all that portion of Soule's wheat which has a little vitality, the young larva of the wheat fly is already to be found, very minute, it is true, but when put under the microscope as lively and vigorous as a young serpent. In the Austrian we have not yet noticed this pest.

A NEW WHEAT.—A new wheat is noticed as growing in Virginia, named the Boughton wheat, which ripens two weeks earlier than the wheat usually grown in the vicinity. The editor of the American Farmer, Baltimore Md., says "its early quality is undoubted. This year it is stated that it would be ready to cut the last week in May. Would not this variety be worth a trial here by way of trying to get ahead of the insect.

PHONOGRAPHY, or WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six; So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and so young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Any body and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

"THE CANADIAN PHONETIC PIONEER" is a Monthly Journal, devoted to the advocacy of the Reform. Price 25 cents per annum.

Address, (post-paid)

Manufacturers, Mechanics and Inventors.

The Scientific American

TO BE ENLARGED!

A NEW VOLUME—NEW SERIES,

TO COMMENCE ON JULY 2d, 1859.

Instead of 416 pages, the yearly volume, Enlarged Series, will contain eight hundred and thirty-two pages of valuable reading matter, useful and instructive to all classes.

THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN is published weekly in quarto form, suitable for binding, and the numbers for a single year contains information in regard to new inventions, Machinery, all branches of Manufacturing processes, Agricultural Implements, Engineering, Millwrighting, Iron Manufacture, chemistry; in fact, almost every industrial pursuit receives more or less attention in its columns.

All Patent claims officially published every week, as reported from the Patent Office; and for

INVENTORS AND PATENTEES

It contains information not to be obtained elsewhere, and which no mechanic, inventor or patentee can well do without.

As a Family Journal it has no superior for real practical utility, since in its columns will be found useful practical receipes.

Careful attention will be given, from time to time, to reports of the Metal, Lumber and other Markets.

Every number will contain sixteen pages and forty-eight columns of matter, with several illustrations of patented machines and other engravings, comprising in a single year about

SIX HUNDRED ORIGINAL ENGRAVINGS.

With the Enlarged Series is presented an opportunity to subscribe not likely to occur again for many years. It will be like commencing a new work—Vol. I, No, I, new Series

Send in your subscriptions without delay, as to begin the new volume—July 2 next.

Terms $2 a Year—$1 for Six Months.

Southern, Western and Canadian money or Post Office stamps taken as par for subscriptions. Canadian subscribers will please to remit twenty-six cents extra on each year's subscription, to pre-pay postage.

A liberal discount to clubs. A prospectus giving full particulars of the inducements for clubs, with specimen copies of the paper, and a pamphlet of information concerning the procuring of Patents may be had gratis, by addressing

Selected Poetry.

The safe Refuge.

Courage, my sorely-tempted heart!
Break through thy woes, forget their smart;
Come forth and on Thy Bridegroom gaze,
The Lamb of God, the Feast of Grace;
Here is thy place!

His arms are open, thither flee!
There rest and peace are waiting thee,
The deathless crown of righteousness,
The entrance to eternal bliss;
He gives thee this!

Then combat well, of nought afraid,
For thou His follower thou art made,
Each battle teaches thee to fight,
Each foe to be a braver knight,
Armed with his might.

If storms of fierce temptations rise,
Unmoved we'll face the frowning skies;
If but the heart is true indeed,
Christ will be with us in our need,—
His own could bleed.

I flee away to Thy dear cross,
For hope is there for every loss,
Healing for every wound and woe,
There all the strength of love I know,
And feel its glow.

Before the Holy One I fall,
The Eternal Sacrifice for all;
His death has freed us from our load,
Peace on the anguished soul bestowed,
Brought us to God.

How then should I go mourning on?
I look to thee,—my fears are gone,
With thee is rest that cannot cease,
For thou hast wrought us full release,
And made our peace.

Thy word hath still its glorious powers,
The noblest chivalry is ours;
O Thou, for whom to die is gain,
I bring Thee here my all, oh deign
To accept and reign!

"BANG UP!"
OR,
THE RESULTS OF ADVERTISING.

CHAPTER I.

"Any thing, over Ben?"

"Not a dollar; I just paid the Journal's bill for advertising, which has pretty much cleaned me out."

"How much?"

"Forty-two dollars and twenty-five cents."

"Ben, I don't like to tell you that you are the biggest fool on the street; but you are."

"Wait, Joe, and see," returned the other with a confident smile.

"Forty-two dollars for advertising!"

"Just so, and for three months' advertising."

"The applicant for "any thing over" gave a peculiar whisper to define the length breadth, and depth of his astonishment.

This conversation occurred in the store of Benjamin Weston, a young and enterprising merchant, who had just commenced business on his own account. The other person, who, to use his own classical expression was "bang up," and wanted to borrow fifty dollars to make up the amount of a note due that day, was Joseph Weston a cousin of the other. They had been playmates in youth and staunch friends in maturity. Though there was a great diversity of opinion on many topics, a strong sympathy existed between them,

They had commenced business at about the same time, and under nearly the same circumstances, both being obliged for the want of sufficient capital to mortgage the stock in their respective stores.

Thus far they had done well, and the prospect was, that both would become wealthy and distinguished merchants.

They had married sisters, and occupied tenements in the same block. Their houses were furnished in substantially the same style, and with no material difference of expenditure. Both had been brought up to business habits, and educated into the principles of a rigid economy.

"Forty-two dollars for advertising," repeated Joe.

"And if I had the money to spare, I would spend double that sum," replied Benjamin.

"What benefit do you expect to realize from it?"

"You are behind the times, Joe. Benefit! What a question! I expect to make my fortune by it."

"Humbug!"

"Look at Brandreth and Swaim."

"Both humbugs."

"No matter for that; if these fellows have been able to make princely fortunes by advertising humbugs, how much more so will he who deals in substantial realities!"

"All gammon!"

"We differ; time will tell who is in the right."

"Seriously, Ben, you will ruin yourself if you go on in this manner. Forty-two dollars for advertising!"

"I shall spend a hundred the next quarter."

"Don't do it, Ben."

"How does it happen, Joe, that you are in the street borrowing money? I never did such a thing since I commenced business."

"How does it happen, Ben, that you haven't got any money to lend?" asked Joe with a smile.

"Because I spent it in advertising."

"Better have spent it for spect and 2: 40's."

"Wait, Joe, wait."

"I spent nothing for advertising; but I will bet you the oysters my sales for the last quarter, are as large as yours."

'I will take you up on the next quarter.'

"Why not the last?"

"Advertising is something like planting potatoes; you must wait for the crops."

"Don't believe in it, Ben. When I have a fifty spot that I don't know what to do with it, I shall put it into my family.—Buy a library, a new sofa, or something of that sort. I should rather go to the White Mountains with it, than throw it away upon newspapers.

"You don't know your own interest, Joe."

"Don't I? Some kinds of business might thrive on advertising; but ours, never. Do you believe the women look at the newspapers before they go shopping?"

"Well, there was a lady in here just now, who said she saw such and such goods advertised by me."

"Pshaw! and on the strength of that you intend to spend fifty dollars more in advertising! Ben, you are crazy;" and Joseph Weston turned upon his heel and left the store, assured in his own mind that his friend was going to ruin.

In his estimation such loose principles would eventually bring him to bankruptcy. But Ben was his friend, and he deeply commiserated him because he clung to such weak and pernicious doctrines.

CHAPTER II.

Business prospered with the young men. By prudent and careful management, each had not only made a living, but been able to pay a small portion of the mortgage on the stock, at the end of the first year.

Joseph had the advantage of his friend in possessing a better location, and though his rent was somewhat higher, the difference was more than compensated by the increased facilities it afforded him. The prospect was decidedly bright to him. If his business increased as it had done, he would be enabled to clear himself of debt in another year.

Under this encouraging aspect he ventured to expend a hundred dollars in additions to his furniture, which his wife insisted was absolutely necessary for their comfort and happiness. The house had been furnished altogether too plain for this progressive age, in her estimation. She was behind some of her friends, who she was sure, were doing no better than her husband.

Joseph was a little obstinate at first; but when there was something so decidedly comfortable in a set of stuffed chairs and a lounge, that he did not hold out in his opposition. He was doing well, and the expenditure would not seriously embarrass him.

With a nice new Brussels carpet and the new furniture, Mrs. Weston's little parlour looked exceedingly pleasant and comfortable. Besides, it looked as though her husband was prospering in his business.

It was so very nice that the young wife could not bear the idea of having the parlour shut up, so that no one should see it till the furniture had grown rusty; consequently she made up her mind that they must have a party.

Their friends had parties; why shouldn't they? It looked stingy not to have one Mrs. Weston was an eloquent debater, and she gained the day in this matter It was true the party was not a very extravagant affair; but it cost Joe some fifty dollars. In the meantime Benjamin had paid quite as much for advertising as his friend had for new furniture and party. Joseph laughed at him, and finally came to believe that he was insane, and would certainly come to ruin within another year.

Mrs. Ben Weston, too, felt decidedly unpleasant about the improvements which had been going on in her sister's house.

"Why can't we have a rosewood table and a set of stuffed chairs, Benjamin?" asked she, pouting her pretty lips into a very unsuitable position.

"Simply my dear because I cannot afford it,' repliedthe philosophical merchant.

"How can Joe afford it?"

"I presume he knows his own business best." He has put over a hundred dollars into his house."

Ben whistled "T'other Side of Jordon," and made no reply.

"Do, Ben, do buy some new chairs."

"Can't afford it."

"Yes, you can."

"No, I can't."

"You can afford it as well as Joe,"

"Perhaps I can."

"Do buy some."

"I should be very glad to gratify you, but I cannot take the money from my business. A year hence, if business prospers with me, you shall have them."

"A year hence," posted the wife.

"I must spend a hundred dollars in advertising the next quarter."

"How foolish!"

"Very foolish, my dear: but it must be done."

"That's the way you throw your money away. You don't catch Joe to do such a trick as that."

"True; but though he has the advantage of having a coroner store, I paid three hundred dollars more on my mortgage note than he did."

"Then you can afford the table and chairs."

"Nay, my dear, I will not spend a dollar for superfluities while I am in debt."

Mrs. Ben Weston felt very bad about it, but her husband was firm, and she was forced to contest herself with the plain furniture.

Mrs. Joe Weston enjoyed her nice parlour till the novelty wore away, and then she discovered that there were a great many other articles wanted to make things look uniform. The two windows must have drapery curtains, a pier glass was needed, and some pictures were wanted to relieve the walls. Her husband, who had once exceeded the limits of his means, found no great difficulty in doing so again, and the things were bought.

But Joe had some scruples about it. His notes began to be troublesome, and every day he was in the street borrowing money. His business, too, had not met his expectation. Instead of increasing in the ratio of his first year's experience, it hardly held its own, and the poor fellow began to have some serious misgivings about the future.

Before the year had half expired, he was obliged to introduce a rigid system of retrenchment into his family and business affairs, in order to keep his expenses within his means.

CHAPTER III.

Another year had passed away in the business experience of the young merchants. The books had been balanced, and the results stood in black and white before them.

Ben had followed up his system of advertising through the year. He had expended large sums—but made the cash by with payment and discretion.

The result exceeded his most sanguine expectations His store was crowded with customers; with genuine, bona fide customers, and with but a small proportion of gadders and fancy shoppers. The newspapers had borne to the best families in the city and country full descriptions of his stock. His name was as familiar as "household words" in the dwellings of the rich and poor, of the farmer, the mechanic and the laborer.

Truly, the harvest was abundant, and Ben rubbed his hands with delight as he cast his eyes over the figures which conveyed to him the pleasing results of his year's operations. He had the means not only of clearing himself of debt, but also of gratifying his wife by giving her all the new furniture she required, besides a handsome surplus with which he increased his business.

The new furniture was bought and set up; every debt was discharged, and the importers and jobbers were eager to give him unlimited credit.

One day, while he was ruminating upon his pleasant store of things, Joe Weston entered the store. For some months past the intercourse between the young merchants had not been as cordial as formerly. Joe's nice thing had rather "set him up;" some of the upper ten had condescended to visit him; and he attended the 'Almanack' parties with his wife.

He was getting ahead fast in his own estimation, and cheerished a supreme contempt for the slow motion of his friend.—But when in the middle of the year, he found himself running down hill, and discovered that Ben's store was crowded with shoppers, while his own was empty, a feeling of envy took possession of him. Ben must be underselling, he concluded, and sooner or later the consequences would appear.

The prosperous merchant could not but notice the sad and dejected mien of his friend as he entered the store.

"How are you, Joe? You are almost a stranger, lately. Where do you keep your self?" said Ben.

"Business, Ben; business!" replied Joe demurely.

"Good! Business before pleasure."

"Any thing to-day?" asked Joe; but the query was not put in that buoyant, elastic tone, which had distinguished him in former times.

"A trifle; how much do you want?" returned Ben, promptly.

"To tell the truth, I am "bang up." I have got a note of four hundred to pay, and I have not yet raised the first dollar towards it."

"You are late: it is half past one now," replied Ben, consulting his watch.

"Ben I am in a tight place," said Joe, in a low, solemn tone.

"Indeed! I am sorrow to hear it," and Ben's face wore an expression of sincere sympathy. "Nothing serious, I hope?"

"I am afraid so."

"What can I do for you?" and the young merchant took down his check book, and examined the state of his bank account.

"I can give you a check for three hundred, if that will do you any good," continued he, taking up the pen to fill out the blank.

Thank you, Ben; you are very kind; but I don't know as I ought to take it."

"Not take it! Why not?"

"If I should pay this note, there is hardly a possibility that I could get through the month."

"So bad as that! 'Pon my soul, I am sorry to hear it."

"Smith and Jones advise me to make an assignment."

"How does it happen? I thought you were doing well?"

"Business has been very dull for the last six months. Haven't you found it so?"

'Well, no; it has been driving with me.'

Joe knew it had: indeed his present visit was not to borrow money but to prepare his friend for the "smash," which was not unavoidable.

"My sales have been light," continued he; "I cannot account for it.

"I can; look here, Joe."

Ben took down his leger, and pointed to the account "Charges," where the sums paid for advertising had been entered. On a ship he had footed them up.

"Five hundred and sixty-five dollars for advertising, Joe! That's what did the business."

Joe was astonished. It was quite as much as he had paid for fine things for the house, and for parties, and the opera; but the investment had been vastly more profitable, inasmuch as taken in connection with his careful management of his business and his economical manner of living, it had laid the foundation of his future fortune. It had given him a good start in business, and a good beginning in half the battle.

Joe Weston failed, and paid only twenty cents on a dollar. His fine furniture was all sold, and he was obliged to board out. But in his extremity Ben was his true friend. He received him into his house, and when his business was settled up, took him into partnership.

The firm is one of the most respectable and prosperous in the city. Joe, ever since he was "bang up," believes in advertising, and any one who opens the Journal, or, indeed any of the daily papers, cannot fail to notice the conspicuous advertisement of "Weston & Co."

A Young Lady Rescued from a Convent.

From the Detroit Tribune.

We have just learned the particulars of one of those cases of sudden disappearance, anxious and long-baffled research, and final recovery which now and then comes to the light from the mainly secret history of Roman Catholic convents. The story is in every respect true, but for reasons of propriety—as the family will not accept newspaper publicity—we suppress all names.

An English gentleman of wealth and taste, who has recently been honored with a seat in one of the Queen's Provincial Cabinets, has been for some years past residing in Montreal. Prior to his position in the Cabinet in England. He had an only daughter a young lady of uncommon beauty and remarkable intelligence. Upon her mind and person, everything that parental love could dictate and wealth procure was lavished.—She was sent to the best schools at Paris, where for several years she was engaged in pursuing her studies under the best instructors, and where she attained astonishing proficiency, becoming a thorough classical scholar and a most perfect linguist.

But in the prosecution of her studies she very naturally fell under the influence of Roman Catholics, who compose the large majority of those engaged in teaching, as well as the other professions in Paris. The doctrines of "the church" were sedulously inculcated, and she was urged to separate herself from the world and join the sisterhood of a convent. All this was kept from her parents, who knew nothing save the rapid progress which their beloved child was making in her studies, and noted with admiration her development into dawning, beautiful womanhood.

At length her education was completed, and her parents—who had resided in Paris during her stay there, to watch over her—returned to England. Shortly after, they removed to Montreal. They had noticed that their daughter was particularly conscientious in all her religious duties, and were pleased, rather than otherwise, to know that to the charms of a cultivated mind their idolized child should add the graces of a renewed and Christian heart. The wealth of affection bestowed upon her by her parents was returned in all its bounty of blessing by their affectionate daughter, and the cup of happiness was full.

Seven weeks ago they arose one morning to a terrible revelation—to sorrow, almost despair. Their daughter was not to be found in the room. But upon the table was a brief note informing them that she deemed it her duty to renounce the world and become a nun, and that she hoped they would be reconciled to her renunciation and not to attempt to follow or discover her, as it would be useless. This was in her own hand writing, so there could be no doubt of the truth of the announcement. It was evident that the influences which had been set at work upon her susceptable mind at Paris, had followed, and that by the wonderful secret police system of the Romish Church, she had been traced from place to place, and the ecclesiastical official informed of her history, position, and tendencies.

The blow came to the family like a thunderclap. It was the last thing they would have expected—that the child upon which they had freely lavished everything, and who had so dutifully returned all their affection, should leave them suddingly, without an hour's warning, and go they know not whither. The mother became well nigh distracted. The father satisfied that she had been wrought on by malign influences and urged to the point of compulsion to take a step of the consequences of which she could know little, resolved to recover her if possible. In an exciting condition, bordering almost on frenzy, he set out to work.

Application was first made to the highest ecclesiastical functionary at Montreal—lord bishop we believe is the title. In that city is a convent of grey nuns. The father suspected his daughter had been taken there. He went to the official, announced his loss and the object of his visit, implored his assistance and offered anything which he might see fit to ask, even if it took his entire estate. The ecclesiastic expressed great sympathy with the father, declared that the convent was open to his inspection from top to bottom, and assured him that if he knew where his daughter was he would gladly restore her to the arms of her sorrowing parents. But no daughter was found in the convent. Subsequent events, however, revealed the fact that she was hidden at this very time in the convent, and that the prelate knew it.

Every avenue of information was sought and used. The father soon learned that the daughter had been sent away from Montreal. To Kingston, Bytown and Toronto he successfully pursued her, searching every convent, but failing in all his endeavours. At Toronto, however, he gained some new and important information. By means which only parental love, aided with money, could devise, he ascertained for a certainty that his daughter had been sent to Detroit or Toledo, that she was sick and wasting away, and desired to return to her parents, being heartily tired of convent life, but that she was kept in durance.

He hastened to Detroit, arriving here a week ago last Sabbath morning. He recollected that a gentleman whom he had met in England years before resided here, and to him he applied for aid. His manner was strange and he was evidently distressed and anxious. A kind offer of assistance in any secret difficulty opened his heart, and the story was soon told. He urged haste as he was fearful that his daughter's keepers might discover how close he was upon her track, and she might again be removed beyond his knowledge and reach by the secret agency that had thus far succeeded in eluding the keen sight of a father's love.—It was ascertained that day that a Catholic lady of considerable position in one of the sisterhoods of the Church in this city, was about to leave for the east on the morrow, and it was resolved to watch her. At the same time the father was sent on to Toledo with letters of introduction to prominent and efficient gentlemen there.

The cars were watched by the officers, daguerreotype in hand, the following morning as they left for the east. The lady whose expected journey had excited the suspicion and the scrutiny went on, but she was without a companion. Disappointment waited upon the anxious father here, but only to threaten his joy and surprise at Toledo. In accordance with the plan fixed upon in this city, the father waited upon the superior of a convent of grey nuns at Toledo, informed her in eloquent French that he was a foreign tourist taking the statistics of the convents in this country, and would like to ascertain the date of its foundation, the name of its founder, the number of its inmates, and other facts of interest, and would desire further, personally to inspect his department.

Disarmed of all suspicion, the lady led him through the convent and gave him the desired information. But among all the sisterhood he could find nowhere his daughter, and heart-sick, weary and disgusted, he was about to leave, when the Superior asked if he would like to see her school of orphans Certainly—and into the room he was ushered. In passing a side door which was partly open, his quick glance discovered his long-sought daughter stationed upon a rack bed!

In a moment he sprung to her side and clasped her to his arms. She was so wasted, says his letter to his friend in this city, which now lies before us, that he could scarcely recognize his beautiful child of six week before. She in her turn was overjoyed to see him. He immediately turned upon the Superior, who stood transfixed with astonishment, and vented upon her his long pent-up feelings. He fairly trembled with rage, while he ceased to tremble with fear as he poured forth a torrent of denunciation upon her head. She stammered out an excuse to the effect that she was only obeying the orders of her Superior at Montreal, of which convent this was a branch, and that she had no discretion in the matter. But the father was too full of joy to waste time with his bickerings there, with his sick child in his arms, and so, receiving a portion of her clothing, hastily gathered up by the affrightened nuns, he left the convent with the prize which he had been seeking day and night for six weeks, with an agony of anxiety that only parental love can experience. A carriage was in waiting with friends to whom he had been introduced, and to whose residence the party repaired. A telegram was despatches to the heart-broken mother at Montreal, who was worn down with sickness and suspense.

This occurred one week ago yesterday. By easy stages the invalid daughter was conveyed to Saratoga, where a letter just received, announces a halt for restoration and health, while the overjoyed mother was hourly expected to crown their happiness and make it once more complete. The narrative which is strictly true, will take its own comment with it.

Our Educated Young Men.

A young man in the vigor of health and intelect, is a noble object. When all his powers are fully developed by a sound education—his intellect made great and his heart good—he approaches sublimity.—We look upon such a young man with peculiar admiration. Undeveloped greatness sleeps in his breast. Powerful energies are locked up in his character, and ready to burst with all their strength upon the world. The world must feel them. Society will be moulded and influenced by his action.—The nation must feel his footsteps. His thoughts and words will lay plans for after generations, and his character daguerreotype itself prominently on every life scene that he acts. The great and throbbing world will be governed by him.

What then should be his rule of action—his mode of life? It is sad to think that so many of our educated young men are not sufficiently pure in life, and noble in character. The influences they give out upon the world are not what they should be. Instead of being patterns of manhood; too many are leading spirits of evil. The wine cup dazzles and bewilders them, and the fatal follies of society foster evil passions in their hearts, which lead them on to headlong destruction.

It is mentioned in one of our exchanges that the Rev. Dr. Hooper in an address at the late commencement of a University, asserted with much confidence, but with the deepest regret, that three-fourths of the young men of the nation who graduate at our colleges, are partially if not entirely ruined, by intoxication! This is a sad and thrilling statement coming from so responsible a source; and although we are not inclined to give it full credence as to the number then ruined, it ought to strike us with sufficient force to lead us to thought and considerate action. The fact that too many leave our colleges polite—or impolite—tipplers and gamblers of some kind, is too strikingly and mournfully manifest in every day life, to bear a word. We are always sorry to see the nobler part of our natures yield to the baser. We cannot look with indifference on the uprooting of the hearts tenderest and divinest affections in any one; but when the crush of affection is followed by the fall of a lofty intellect, that should have proclaimed corrective truth to the world, then we feel doubly sad, and would speak a word to stay this heart and head ruin that is rushing upon the world.

Active young men are frequently the first to take a step ruin-ward. A proud ambition and a fiery brain are quick to receive an evil stimulus. Those who are the quickest in their sympathies and thee kindest in heart, are frequently the first to fall the ruined dupes of society. It is a glad sight to see a fond-hearted and hopeful young man in the joy and strength of his youth, treading lightly over care and difficulties and displaying opposition with buoyant spirits and manly efforts; but it is a sad sight to see that same young man run with all his fondness of heart and weight of intellect, gaily and merrily sailing down the gilded paths that lead to certain destruction.

To the educated young men of our nation we would say, be men! There is more satisfaction of heart in being good and great, than in throwing your friends and society into occasional spasms by your brilliancy and eccentricities. The first young man is a danger to himself and society. Nervous and unsettled brains are not what the world wants. The present condition of society demands a barrier and firmer character of intellect—self-balanced intellect, that will not be jostled out of place by society, but will quietly take its place. Be, then, sentinels of morality. The world looks up to you with a great amount of reverence and trust. It beholds your strength, and puts confidence in your manhood. Will you betray that confidence, or can make the promise placed in your hands?—Mich. Journal.

The Mysterious Flute.

Not long since I was invited to pay a visit to some friends out of town. In the family were three young girls like myself, besides young children. Being thinked, we spent the greater part of the first evening of my visit in singing and playing, and, at a proper hour retired for the night as was supposed. As I was a great favorite with all the girls, each one wanted to sleep with me, and the oldest, who was about thirteen years of age, carried the day, and I was conducted to her room. I observed that instead of going to my room, I should remain in their double-bedded room. Accordingly instead of going to sleep we lay and talked (as girls often do) some hours. Milly touched me on the arm in the middle of a most interesting account I was giving her of the opera, and certain regular attendants there, and said:

"C., do you here that?"

"Hear what? I do not listen to people when they are not talking to me," naturally supposing she was referring to Margaret and Fanny who were in the other bed.

"There! now girls, don't you hear it—Some one is playing on the piano."

"Who can it be?" said Milly, "why did you not lock it Fanny, it is your place to do it."

"Well," said Fanny, "I did, and the key is in the pocket of my dress."

This, of course, we would not believe. So, trembling from head to foot, she got up, dark as it was, and found the dress with the key in its pocket. All this while we heard the piano, sounding in single scales from top to bottom, and vice versa, but producing the most wonderful quality of tone, resembling those of a music box more than anything else.

We had all heard of spirits and were quite sure there were some in the house, for it was not probable that any of the children would be up at that hour of the night.—So it was decided we should hold each other by the hand, and go across the hall to the father's room. All this time the scales were being played on the piano, as if some one had been ordered to practice for an hour. We succeeded in awakening Mr W., and in a few minutes he came out with a light in hand, when we formed a procession after him, with chattering teeth, but withal eager faces, for our curiosity was stronger than our fear. We entered the parlor; sure enough the piano is shut and locked, while the gamut is being played regularly and distinctly. The father asks for the key; all the girls scream out at once:

"Don't open it; it must be spirits."

But Mr. W- does not believe in piano-playing spirits, and opens the instrument, while we are all huddled together, and he exclaims:

"Gracious me its a mouse!

How we laughed and screamed, and looked for the little animal, but it was of no use, mousy had practised his lesson and had gone.

It was easy to account for the evenness of his playing, as he was too small to skip a note, and therefore touched every note.

COURTESY AND KINDNESS.

Courtesy, among "well-bred" people, would seem to be a matter of course, and good-nature is not an uncommon characteristic of a larger class. But kindness is something more than either of these, involving appealing to higher instincts and rarer feelings. True kindness is almost always courteous, because gentleness and sympathy teach it so; but the converse of the rule hardly holds good. The show of politeness may be taught, and may be no well learned as to pass muster in that society which rarely peers beneath the smooth surfaces of things. Good-nature, too, is often a shallow, and sometimes even a selfish characteristic. It implies the possession of neither sympathy, tact, nor thoughtfulness; of which qualities kindness is but the natural manifestation. What we call good breeding in individuals is simply that kindness of manner which makes us at once feel easy in their society, pleased with them, and freed from troublesome consciousness of ourselves. That same self-consciousness is probably at the foot of two thirds of the awkwardness and ill-breeding that we meet with. It teaches an artificial or "studied" manner then which nothing is more uncomfortable or absurd to behold. Also, since they who labor under the pressure of self-consciousness cannot possibly have time to think of anything else, there can exist none of that kind feeling which is quick to perceive and take thought for the feeling of those around them. Thus, the very fundamental element of good breeding is lost. But where this discriminating kindness of heart is joined to naturalness of manner, there will always be genuine even if not conventional courtesy. Good feeling speedily teaches good manners.

Kindness is, in fact, sympathy made manifest. But it must be admitted that, granted the feeling of kindness, the desire to be kind does not necessarily secure its own fulfilment. Something is needed, besides, of that subtle essence we call tact, that happy combination of instinct and quick intelligence which enables us to evince our sympathy or kindness in the manner best suited to the idiosyncrasy of the recipient. This especially applies to our intercourse with absolute comparative strangers. The most obtuse learn in time to adapt themselves, in some measure at least, to those constantly around them. Moreover, our friends, and those who know us well, will generally give us credit for kind attention, even when we fail in effect. But with those who know us little we have at once all to learn and everything to teach. It is in such cases that what we mean by "good breeding" helps us out of the difficulty.

For instance, it is not kind, and therefore is not courteous, to be over-demonstrative with a reserved person, or over-reticent to one whose own warm open heart asks for answering frankness. Nor need we forfeit one iota of what is worth preserving of our individuality by thus adapting ourselves to the differing characteristics of those around us. It would do very few of us any harm if we all "rubbed each others angles down" a little way. The reserved may be unbent it would be a wholesome discipline for them e practice candor; while the demonstrative would do well sometimes to set a guard on their too great readiness to say and do.

Finally, there is one simple and all-sufficing rule to bear in mind in this as in many other cases. Love leads to most of us "as it," forethought, knowledge. Where we love, we understand, and can make ourselves understood. It is this which imparts to the simplest the faculty of so placing himself in the position of his neighbor that he instinctively divines the course of speech, manner, and action which will be most grateful and beneficial to him. It is hardly enough to "do unto others as we would they should do unto us;" we must try to "do unto others as we would they should do unto us—if we were in their place." The first is the letter of Christian morality which may serve to save ourselves. The addition is in the spirit of Christian kindness, which may and does many a time save our brethren.

THE ARMISTICE.

From the Times.

While we are discussing the progress of the plot and speculating as to the nature of the catastrophe the curtain falls. Yesterday France and Austria were upon the point of joining in another battle. The celebrated fortified Quadrangle had been reached, Peschiera had been invested, Mantua had been masked, Verona was on the point of being summoned, Venice was threatened, and Garibaldi was manœuvring under the rear of the great fortress. The waves of warfare were undulating and vibrating to another great burst in foam.—To-day the Spirit of Peace has breathed upon the waters, and the storm is for the moment at an end. Three months ago we expected peace and were surprised by war. To-day Europe was waiting in breathless expectation for a great battle, fought in the very fortresses of Austria, and is again surprised by the calm announcement that an armistice has been concluded, and that the great armies are for the moment no longer enemies.

The first impulse is one of joy. It is a great relief to know that the human misery which we have from day to day been recording is stayed, that the dogs of war are again chained up, and that half a million of men have ceased to fly at each others' throats. But, this first congratulation felt and uttered, we consider more closely the circumstances of this sudden halt of a conqueror in his triumph, and ask ourselves whether this armistice is really the prelude to a peace, or whether it is but a stop to take breath for a further race of conquest. The position of the two parties is not of that equal character which would enable us to hope that both are in the same degree desirous of lasting peace. Austria has hitherto lost everything that she could have lost. She has been beaten in every battle, she has been driven back from every position. All the prestige of her arms has been destroyed, and her troops are demoralized less by defeat than by a profound distrust of their leaders and their military organization. She could not be in a worse position than she now is. If she had lost another great battle on the Adige, if Peschiera had fallen, if Verona had been taken, and if Mantua had been stormed, it would not be more apparent to the world than it is at this moment that Austria is unable to cope with France as a military Power. To her, therefore, a cessation of hostilities is but the surrender of all hope of retrieving her military honor. In consenting to it she must have abandoned all her pride, and must have embraced only the last hope of safety. She must mean peace, and she must mean to pay the price of peace, if this step is any other than an ill-advised momentary expedient. To France, on the contrary, either for peace or for war, this armistice is worth another great victory. Paris may illuminate for it as for a victory on the Adige, or for the storm of Mantua. Austria is at home, with her resources behind her, and with Germany mustering in her rear. France is far away, reduced by her hard fights, requiring reinforcements, anxious to bring on her supplies, and desirous of time to enable her combinations from the seacoast to develop themselves. Every moment of delay to France is a gain.—Every moment of delay conceded by Austria is a confession of exhaustion. If this armistice is but a truce, like that concluded ten years ago between Sadeizky and Charles Albert, then it is a fatal concession on the part of Francis Joseph, for it will but enable his enemy to repair his strength.

We will hope, however, that in consenting to this armistice the Emperor of Austria has made up his mind to the necessary conditions of a peace. The nature of those conditions cannot but have presented themselves to him. On the evening of that day of Solferino all hope of re-establishing the authority of Austria over any portion of Lombardy must have passed away like a dream in the morning. He must have felt that the moment was come either for absolute submission or for another obstinate and hopeless fight. He has chosen the former alternative. He has submitted. Well what will be the terms? The progress of this contest has done much to disclose to us the character of the man who has brought this campaign to so speedy a termination. He never swerves from his formed design, but he is never elated by success, and is content to march step by step, and by short certain advances, to the objects he has proposed to himself. He may be expected to be moderate in the hour of his triumph.—But, however moderate he may be, Austria can scarcely expect more than to be allowed to enjoy what she has for the moment preserved. Lombardy is gone, and the fortresses which enabled her to dominate Lombardy cannot be expected to remain unconditionally in her hands. Venice is not yet a part of the French conquests, and she may stipulate that the Queen of the Adriatic may be allowed to retain an independent character under the most popular of her archdukes. Lombardy, however, has fallen beneath the sword, and the conqueror must dispose of it according to his will.

The House of Lords was about this evening solemnly to debate the propriety of interfering by meditation between the waring Powers. They have themselves saved us this humane but very delicate enterprise. The "just and comprehensive terms" which Lord Stratford de Redcliffe was prepared to advocate in the House of Lords will no longer be at the suggestion of England or of Germany or of Russia. Austria has chosen to take the sword, and by the fortune of the sword she must abide. Any recommencement of hostilities is out of the question. Her enemy is now in the position which she herself held when a similar armistice was made and broken, and when seven days sufficed for Radetzky to finish the war. Before this truce is ended the French army will be refreshed and reinforced, a fleet of gunboats will be ready for launching upon the lake that surrounds Mantua, and a great army will be ready to make its descent upon the shores of Northern Italy. Broken and disheartened as Austria now is, she is yet better able to fight at this moment than she will be at any future time. We believe, therefore, in peace, and we believe that the path to peace will be made smooth to her, for the Emperor has won the advantage which for the moment he proposes to himself. He has climbed his day's journey, and he is probably inclined to halt and rest and recruit his strength, and to measure the altitude above him. If this should be so and if this war between France and Austria is ended, France comes tremendous in power out of the conflict, and Europe will look on with still increasing interest, much meditating upon the future, while she rests upon her arms.

How the Money Goes!

It is an extremely painful duty for us to be called upon to make public facts which, should we omit or neglect to bring before the notice of the people, would justly hurl upon us scorn and contempt. Thus feeling a sense of duty we shall at all times, and under all circumstances, condemn in public men acts which are contrary to right and justice. It is astonishing, yet true, that men can be found who, after becoming members of a legislative body and solemnly take oath to discharge their duties as such honestly and impartially, bringing forward measures which are so glaringly selfish that if the introducers of them were not entirely lost to shame and honor, they would never attempt in an enlightened community.—A wise clause was inserted in the Municipal statutes last Session which provides that no officer or other party interested in any contract with the Town shall be eligible to become a member of the Council. Much mischief and dishonesty is prevented by this provision, no doubt, but if the statutes went a little fa ther and disqualified all parties interested in any Company with which the Town might be brought into difficulty, it would have been still another step in the right direction. No greater proof of this is wanting than the resolution brought forward by Mr. Conger in the Town Council on Monday evening last, providing for the expenditure of an indefinite sum, (probably £20 or £30) on the road leading to the Cemetery at the south end of the Town. Let us consider what claim either the Company or the road has to the assistance of the Town of Peterboro'. In the first place the Cemetery is owned by a Company of private individuals. Secondly, the portion of the road on which the sum of money was ordered to be expended, is outside of the Corporation limits. As to the first of these it will be seen that the Town is no more required to place money into the hands of the Cemetery Company than they have to put it into their own pockets. For the second point, the resolution was passed in the face of the law which sets forth that no Municipal Council has of itself the right to expend public funds outside of the Corporation limits, consequently these gentlemen voting in the affirmative bold themselves personally liable for the means thus illegally appropriated.

The affair carries its own comment with it? Mr. Conger, it is well known, is President of this so-called C metery Company, and it is therefore not to be wondered at that he should be found moving the matter now before us; but that he should find gentlemen ready to carry him out in so barefacedly dishonest a scheme, is deplorable in the extreme. Such men as Mr. Conger have no business to sit in Council to legislate for a community, and our Town Council must needs be purged of such men before a healthy system of government can be brought about. In the meantime we hope to see influential parties, who have the interest of the town at heart, taking steps to prevent the expenditure thus illegally sanctioned; and if not successful, to hold these gentlemen responsible for their mis-deeds.

PEACE!

We live in an age of changes. But a week ago our columns teemed with the history of bloody feuds, and pictured the perishing of ten thousands souls, and the reign of the king of terrors, who seemed to threaten the whole continent with revolution. This week, how changed the scene. Accounts reach us over the wires that the war is likely to come to a close, but that poor Italy within grasp of independence is doomed to sink into a deeper slavery than that from which it was confidently anticipated she was being released.

Particulars will be found under the proper heading in another column.

We wonder if the Review is yet convinced that its estimate of the new Town Hall was a false one. Don't sneak out of it in that way, Thomas, without letting us know what you think about it.

On our first page will be found an article which our business men will profit by if they read it, and take the hint. The only man in Peterboro' who is not "hemming up" in his wits has spent short money in advertising. Everybody knows who he is.

The Market By-law.

We continue the publication of the replies of the business men of the Town to the questions lately submitted to them by the Market By-law Committee in reference to our Market regulations, believing the subject to be one of the highest importance as affecting both the trade of the Town and the farming community in its vicinity. We give to-day the letters of W. Clarton and R. Nichols, Esq'rs., together with the petition from the merchants presented to the Council last year at the inception of the By-law. It really seems inexplicable that this petition should have been thrown upon the table as not being worthy of the slightest consideration, and we cannot help arriving at the conclusion that the instigators of this measure had some other object in view than the general welfare of the Town. We would have supposed that in introducing a measure of this kind the Council would have in the first place solicited the opinions of the merchants as to the effect it would be likely to have upon trade, and not now when the By-law is breaking down, or that they would have ascertained what regulations were in force in other Towns in the Province and profit by their experience. We are aware that a counter petition was presented to the Council also, but we are perfectly satisfied that the greater number of the names attached to it were obtained through misrepresentation. The rate-payers were told that the shop-keepers wished to destroy the By-law for the purpose of securing the sale of butter, eggs, &c., for themselves, and they were urged in consequence to petition in favor of the By-law. Is there anything of this in the petition? No, nothing of the kind! The object the merchants had in view was to make the Town a good market for produce by exempting from the By-law articles that did not enter into general consumption in the Town, knowing that the fewer restrictions were placed upon trade the more it would prosper. They had not, nor have they now, (in our judgment) any desire whatever to interfere in the least with the By-law so far as affects the inhabitants of the town. We shall again refer to the subject:

To the Mayor and Town Council of the Town of Peterborough.

We the undersigned business men of the Town of Peterborough, beg to represent to your Worshipful body, that we have seen with regret and alarm, that by a By-law passed under date, the 3rd May, 1858, by your Worshipful body; the mercantile business heretofore carried on with the farmers by us in this Town will be seriously interfered with, as it is so drawn, that it may be construed to apply to articles of commerce, and if it is applied to them, it must have the effect of driving business from the Town; as those who have Wheat, Wool, Sheep skins, Pork in Barrels, Butter in Firkins, and such staple articles to sell, will not bring them here if compelled to take them to the Market House, and pay toll for the standing room they require there, while on the other side of the Otonabee and elsewhere, no such inconvenience or expense is imposed on the farmers, and even if it were less certain to drive the sellers of these articles to another market; it will, if this policy be carried out, impose additional burthens upon us, who have already to pay our full share of the taxes, and we must say that we feel it to be unfair to us, as well as injurious to the town and neighboring country, to throw upon us additional outlay, by compelling us to employ more assistants in conducting our business, and thereby rendering us less able to compete with our neighbors in buying produce.

We therefore pray that you will be pleased to amend the said By-law, so far as regards articles that are bought and sold as merchandise, and that such may be excluded from its operation.

Peterborough, 14th June, 1859.

James Edwards Esq., Town Clerk.

DEAR SIR,—I respectfully tender my opinions on the points submitted in your circular of the 11th inst.

[1. Do you consider the present tariff of fees exorbitant?]

The tariff of fees is not exorbitant.

[2. How, in your opinion, would it answer to abandon the fees altogether and charge only for the use of the scales?]

Fees should be collected upon all articles exposed for sale on the Market place.

[3. Is the plan of selling the dues advisable or would it not be better to appoint an efficient person as Market Clerk?]

The plan of farming or selling the Market dues is most objectionable, and injurious to the interest of the town and harrassing and oppressive to the farming community in its vicinity.

[4. Ought any articles to be exempted from the operations of the By-law and if so, what articles?]

I would respectfully answer this question by referring the committee to a respectable Petition signed by nearly every business man in town, and presented to the Council last year, but upon which no action was taken.

Remarks. I believe the object Parliament had in view in passing the general law upon which your By-law is based, was not for the purpose of creating a revenue for towns or cities, but for the convenience of the inhabitants by promoting general order in the streets.

It ought to be the desire of the Council, while leaving all sectional considerations aside, to do every thing in their power to foster the trade of the town. It is quite clear, that if merchants are compelled to employ additional hands to carry on their business by an attendance on the Market, the expenses of such additional help must come out of the produce, and thereby reduce the Market value of our staple commodities. Generally it will have the effect of preventing competition, as but few will employ buyers to attend the market.

At present the business men are heavily taxed for town purposes, and the principal portion of the revenue derived therefrom is expended in opening streets, building bridges, and other improvements, which are of benefit to the whole community, and not to the business men alone. Why then should the latter be taxed for the benefit of the former? Why should not the whole community be taxed for the benefit of the whole community? Why should not the farmer, who comes to the Town to sell his produce, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the mechanic, who comes to the Town to sell his manufactures, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the professional man, who comes to the Town to practice his profession, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the laborer, who comes to the Town to sell his labor, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the capitalist, who comes to the Town to invest his money, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the gentleman, who comes to the Town to spend his money, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the lawyer, who comes to the Town to practice his profession, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the doctor, who comes to the Town to practice his profession, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the clergyman, who comes to the Town to preach the gospel, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the editor, who comes to the Town to publish his paper, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the printer, who comes to the Town to print his paper, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the publisher, who comes to the Town to publish his paper, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the bookseller, who comes to the Town to sell his books, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the stationer, who comes to the Town to sell his stationery, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the druggist, who comes to the Town to sell his drugs, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the grocer, who comes to the Town to sell his groceries, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the butcher, who comes to the Town to sell his meat, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the baker, who comes to the Town to sell his bread, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the tailor, who comes to the Town to sell his clothes, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the shoemaker, who comes to the Town to sell his shoes, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the blacksmith, who comes to the Town to sell his iron, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the carpenter, who comes to the Town to sell his lumber, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the mason, who comes to the Town to sell his stone, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the plasterer, who comes to the Town to sell his plaster, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the painter, who comes to the Town to sell his paint, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the glazier, who comes to the Town to sell his glass, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the plumber, who comes to the Town to sell his lead, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the tinsmith, who comes to the Town to sell his tin, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the coppersmith, who comes to the Town to sell his copper, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the brazier, who comes to the Town to sell his brass, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the founder, who comes to the Town to sell his castings, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the machinist, who comes to the Town to sell his machinery, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the engineer, who comes to the Town to sell his engines, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the millwright, who comes to the Town to sell his mills, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the carpenter, who comes to the Town to sell his lumber, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the mason, who comes to the Town to sell his stone, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the plasterer, who comes to the Town to sell his plaster, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the painter, who comes to the Town to sell his paint, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him? Why should not the millwright, who comes to the Town to sell his mills, pay his share of the taxes, as well as the merchant, who buys it from him?

TOWN COUNCIL.

MONDAY, July 25, 1859.

Council met. 11 present.

Minutes read and confirmed.

The Mayor submitted a report relative to the sale of two debentures.

A letter from C. A. Weiler, Solicitor, informing the Council that he had, at the instruction of Mr. John Thomson, taken proceedings against the Council for the recovery of damages sustained by him through inefficient drainage on George St.

A communication from G. S. Boulton, which will be found in another column, was handed in to the Council.

Petitions handed in asking the Council for repairs on the Streets, were referred to Com. on Streets and Bridges.

Two reports from the Street and Bridges Com. were received and laid on the table.

A report from Com. on Fire Department stating that they could not recommend the Council to repair the engine of the Juvenile Fire Company, was received.

An account from Mr. T. Woods for £1 12s 6d was referred to Street and Bridge Committee.

An account from Mr. McIntosh of Toronto of $135 dollars was referred to Com. on Finance and Assessment.

A petition from Mr. Quagney asking improvements on Rubridge street was referred to Com. on Streets and Bridges.

A letter from McDougall & Bro., Montreal, in reference to sale of debentures was read.

A check was ordered to be issued in favor of the Chairman of Streets and Bridges Com. to the amount of $96 87c. Also one in favor Messrs. Hogan, and Heathorn for $17 75c.

The Treasurer was authorised to pay to W. Dickson 10 per cent due on a debenture held by him, together with costs.

The Mayor was instructed to inform Mr. Weiler in reply to his letter that the Council does not consider itself liable for any claim for damages that Mr. Thomson may urge.

The Streets and Bridges Com. were instructed to expend the sum of $10 in repairs on Smithtown Hill.

Moved by Mr. Conger and seconded.—that the street leading to the Cemetery be placed in a state of repair, and the bridge near Mrs. Weir's rebuilt, under the direction of the Street and Bridge Com. and the money and the expense of said Bridge to be borne equally by the Town and Cemetery company., and that the money resolution be suspended for that purpose.—Carried.

The Street and Bridge Com. were instructed to have the side-walk ordered by this Council on Bethune Street, immediately proceeded with.—Carried.

The Council then adjourned for two weeks.

Dr. McKeon having transferred his residence to Cobourg, leaves his accounts for collection, with Mr. Edgar. Wm. Coulter Esq., Druggist, Peterborough, is empowered to give receipts and make any reduction he pleases in cases of immediate settlement. It will depend upon the ability and willingness of his patients to pay the accounts, whether Dr. McKeon will return after a few months to reside again in Peterborough. Meantime, finding a medical gentleman of his own name here, he would, though a stranger to him, bespeak in his behalf a due share of the public patronage of the place.

The last Edinburgh Review has an interesting paper on the labors and emoluments of woman. The writer affirms that education is the surest means of placing her in the position nature intended her to occupy. Out of six millions of women in England and Scotland, he shows that no less than half are industrial in their mode of life, more than a third being self supporting. The matrimonial cases under recent laws have disclosed an amazing amount of female industry; almost every wife who sought protection proving that she had supported the household and acquired property. The reviewer does not hesitate to attribute difficulties in regard to the independence of women to the jealousy of men. This jealousy, he says—"Stows itself with every step gained in civilization, and its immediate effect is to pauperize a large number of women who are willing to work for their bread; and we need not add, to condemn to perdition many more who have no choice between starvation and vice. The jealousy that keeps country women from the employment of engraving the brass-works of a watch, and from pasting patterns of floss silk upon cards, for trade purposes, long kept the school of design in London closed against female pupils, and renders it still almost impossible for an English woman to qualify herself for trusting the dimness of women and children. The same jealousy cost many lives in the late war, by delaying the reception of the nurses into the hospitals on the East, and by restricting their actions when there. In the Staffordshire potteries women are largely employed in painting porcelain; an art which they are better qualified to practice than men. It will hardly be credited, but we can vouch for the fact that such is the jealousy of men that they compel the women to 'paint without a rest for the hand,' and the masters are obliged by their own workmen to mention this absurd act of injustice.—"Women."

Arrival of the North Briton

PEACE PROCLAIMED!

COMMERCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

Quebec, July 25.

The steamship North Briton, from Liverpool at 9. 30 on themorning of the 13th inst., arrived here yesterday afternoon.—Among her passengers is Cyrus W. Field, who has accomplished the object of his visit to Europe.

The Anglo-Saxon arrived at Liverpool at eight o'clock on the evening of the 11th.

THE WAR.

The Paris Moniteur gives the following explanations of the circumstances attending the armistice:—The great neutral powers exchanged communications with the object of offering their mediation to the belligerents. The first act was to be an armistice, but the endeavor to bring about this result was not successful until some days ago, when the French fleet was about beginning hostilities against Venice, and a new conflict before Verona was imminent. The Emperor, faithful to his sentiments of moderation, and anxious to prevent the useless effusion of blood, did not hesitate to assure himself whether the disposition of the Emperor of Austria was conformable to his own. It was a sacred duty for two Emperors immediately to suspend hostilities which mediation could render objectless. The Emperor of Austria had shown similar intentions. An armistice was concluded. The two Emperors had an interview on the morning of the 11th, at Villafranca. The Emperor of Austria was accompanied by Generals Hess, Grunne, Mollner, Kollenstein, Romany and others of the staff.

TURIN, July 11.—An official bulletin publishes the text of the armistice, besides the articles already known. The result of the interview between the Emperors has been the conclusion of peace. The following is a telegram from the Emperor to the Empress announcing the fact:—

VALLEGGIO, Monday, July 11.—Peace is signed between the Emperor of Austria and myself. The bases of peace are: The Italian Confederation, under the honorary Presidency of the Pope; the Emperor of Austria concedes his rights in Lombardy to the Emperor of the French, who transfers them to the King of Sardinia; the Emperor of Austria preserves Venice, but she will form an integril part of the Italian Confederation.

This despatch was bulletined on the Paris Bourse on the 12th, and the funds rose two and a-half per cent. Closing quotations are not mentioned, but were about 70.

The news did not transpire in London till after the official closing hour of consols, so that the full effect is not known. Sales were made late in the day at about 96¼.

The Daily News (city article) says the funds on Tuesday opened quiet, and business remained stagnant until about 2 o'clock when Consols were quoted at ¼ per cent lower than on Monday. Influential buyers who are believed to act on good foreign information, then came forward, and by 3 o'clock a rise of ¼ per cent had taken place. No bullion operations at the Bank.

Tuesday's Daily News affirms that the just hopes and expectations of Italy are deceived. History will call the Emperor to a strict account for having made war on false pretences and signed a mock and selfish peace—a peace that leaves Austria impregnably fortified in the heart of Northern Italy—that commits Central Italy to the patronage of the Pope, and to constant menaces of military intervention on the part of the Pope's patrons and protectors—that takes no account of the welfare of the people, and substitutes for national independence a confederation under the lock and key of Austrian garrison. The Emperor has sown the seeds of future wars. The closer we examine the intended pacification, the more futile and iniquitous it appears.

The Morning Post contends that the soul of the treaty agreed upon is the nationality guaranteed under every variety of local government in a confederation of the Italian States. The Emperor of Austria is to be King of Venetia, solely as an integral member of the confederation. He will role no less than three millions of Italians, and will be controlled by a confederation ruling not less than 26,000,000. The Pope is shorn virtually of his temporal supremacy. He is deprived of the substance, but keeps the shadow.

The Times says Venice must hope that her independence will not be a mere name, and that the influence of France and Austria united will not be more unbearable than the rule of Austria singly. The Romans must hope that the Italian Confederacy under the honorary presidency of the Pope will be nothing like any Government they have hitherto known. The Papal States are left as they were, but with a master somewhat greater than before. He is an honorary President of the Italian Confederation, and General Goyon holds the sword by his side. The King of Naples is made a member of the Confederation, and has to learn the worth of that honor and its import. Europe has to welcome a new power, the Italian Confederation, a brother older in dignity if not in time. England has nothing to do but look on. Austria is somewhat humbled, but is relieved of a difficulty. Sardinia is aggrandised with a Province that mistrusts her, and a neighbor that has earned an inextinguishable claim to her gratitude. The Grand Duke and once more, we suppose, to be reinstated on their thrones. France now has Rome in her hands—she has Europe before her—she can raise all Italy and the half of the Austrian Empire against those Germans whom she has so often beaten, yet on the very summit of her ambition she renounces it.—France has spent fifty millions sterling and fifty thousand men only to give Milan a Piedmontese instead of an Austrian master, and to establish the Pope in a temporal dignity even beyond his imagination, and capable of extension. Is all the rest? The Emperor's game must be a very long one.

The Vienna Gazette says of the armistice that an autograph letter addressed by Napoleon to the Emperor of Austria led to the negotiation.

A Verona telegraph says the armistice was concluded after repeated requests from the French, after their counsel had been obeyed to all the conditions asked by Austria.

The Times Paris correspondent says that the typhus fever raged in both camps; 16,000 to 11,000 were attacked with it in the allied army.

Napoleon's proposed plan for revolutionizing Hungary and Transylvania was disapproved of by Russia.

GREAT BRITAIN.

In the House of Commons, on the 11th the Government guarantee to the Red Sea Telegraph Company was debated. On the motion to postpone the confirmation of the guarantee, it was generally conceded that it was to cancel the contract. The motion to postpone was rejected, and the action of the House of Lords in the matter was agreed to.

Mr. Disraeli enquired whether the Government had received information on the subject of the armistice, and if it could state wether the armistice was a new military invention, or whether it involved any prospect of negotiations for peace.

Lord J. Russel said nothing appeared on the face of the armistice to indicate that it applied to anything but military purposes. It was, however, for five weeks, and he trusted during that interval the belligerent powers would be ready to propose terms by which hostilities would be suspended.—The Government had no exclusive information, but expected despatches soon.

General Peel announced that the entire military force in the country on the first of June was 109,600, including embodied militia.

On the 12th instant, Lord Wodehouse in the House of Lords, and Lord John Russel in the House of Commons, read Napoleon's telegraph announcing peace. The latter added that although the war was at an end, the Emperor of the French would demand Savoy as compensation for the expenses of the war. He had made no demand, and desired no addition to France. Loud and prolonged cheering greeted this announcement.

The House of Commons agreed to the House of Lord's amendment to the Atlantic Telegraph bill—Mr. Lang having explained the conditions of the Government guarantee as already known.

Lord John Russell stated that the Government had come to no determination respecting the acceptance of the Feejee Islands.

A select committee to enquire into the packet and telegraph contracts was appointed.

The last grand review and sham fight of the season had taken place at Aldershott in presence of the Queen and Royal family, who remained at the camp for several days.

The Shipping Gazette believes that the Austrian mail contract has been given to Lever of the Galway line, and efforts were being made to get Milford Haven made the port of arrival and departure.

The following is the committee appointed to advise the Atlantic Telegraph Company on their new cable:—Robert Stephenson, Mr. Brunel, E. Clark, Mr. Bidder, Professor Wheatstone, Dr. W. A. Miller and Mr. Langridge. Mr. Latimore Clark is the new engineer of the company.

NAPLES.

Two hundred soldiers, fifty of whom were Swiss, revolted on the 7th inst. at Naples, and left Fort Carmina for the purpose of rousing other troops to revolt, in which they failed. On arriving at Champ de Mars, all the Swiss and native troops who remained faithful met them with a discharge of artillery; forty insurgents were killed and the rest disarmed. It is stated that Filangier had resigned the Presidency of the Council, but the King urged him to continue in office. He and the King had adopted a basis for important measures.

TURKEY.

The Turkish steamships Silistria and Kars are reported lost. The Silistria had 350 passengers for Constantinople, 77 of whom perished. The Turkish crew assassinated the 20 of the passengers and plundered the Christians during the slavage.—The Kars had 300 passengers on board from Constantinople, and had not been heard of.

The Persians are said to be actively preparing in anticipation of war with Turkey.

INDIA AND CHINA.

The Calcutta mails of June 3, and Hong Kong of May 21, have reached England. The Indian Government, it is said, had decided to permit all European troops who might desire it to receive their discharge and a free passage to Great Britain, thus removing all grounds of complaint. It was expected that thousands would avail themselves of the offer. The rebel forces are gradually diminishing.

COMMERCIAL.

Breadstuffs Markets, Liverpool July 13.—The demand for wheat, flour, and Indian corn has been very moderate, and prices have not experienced an immediate decline. Flour—Prices 4d per quintal lower than this day week, western canal 9s 9d a 10s 6d; Philadelphia and Baltimore 10s 7d a 11s.

Grain—Wheat, a steady consumptive demand at 4d per quintal less than last Tuesday; white Canadian 9s 9d; red mixed ditto 8s a 9s 8d. Corn in moderate request with full prices; white 7s 10 a 8s; yellow 6s 3d a 6s 6d; mixed 6s 3d.

Provisions—the market still remains in active. Pork—transactions few and prices unaltered; prime mess, new, 82s 6d a 85s per barrel of 200lbs. Lard—The sales rather exceed 50 tons. Ashes—pots 29s a 30s; pearls 30s 6d a 31s. Groceries.—Sugar—West India, duty paid, good brown 35s a 38s. Tea—Good Congou, in bond, 1s 2¼d a 1s 6d. Molasses—Barbadoes 16s 6d a 17s.

Consols opened on Wenesday at 95¼ a 95¼.

THE ARMISTICE.

The Emperor Napoleon has issued the following order of the day:—

VALLEGGIO, July 10.

"Soldiers,—An armistice was concluded on the 8th instant, between the belligerent parties, to extend to the 15th of August.—This truce will permit you to rest after your glorious labors, and to recover, if necessary, new strength to conclude the work which you have so gloriously inaugurated. I am about to return to Paris, and shall leave the command of the army to Marshal Vellant, but as soon as the hour of combat will have struck you will see me again in your midst to partake of your dangers."

The Times Vienna correspondent says that it was believed there that the British Government had brought about the armistice.

Another authority says that the Prince Regent of Prussia took the initiatory in suggesting the armistice.

The Vienna Gazette says of the armistice, that an autograph letter addressed by the Emperor Napoleon to the Emperor of Austria, led to the negotiations, the result of which was a five weeks armistice.

A young woman named Rosanna Daly, was killed by lightning in King township on the 19th inst.

WAR INCIDENTS.

At Paris it is believed in some quarters that the French loss at the battle of Solferino amounted to 16,000 or 18,000 men, as follows: Niel's corps 6,000 to 7,000; D'Hilliers' nearly 5,000; McMahon's 2,800; Canrobert's 1,000, besides the casualities in the artillery and special corps.

The French people are said to be dissatisfied with the scantiness of the details as yet published in the Moniteur.

The London Times gives a long description of the new iron steam ram, which it says, will be afloat next June. Her total length will be 380 feet, breadth 58; total weight at sea about 9,000 tons; full speed 16 miles an hour. About 220 feet of the broadside of the vessel will be of lead, 24 inches thick; this will be covered by armor plates 4½ inches thick on the deck. The ram will be armed with 35 Armstrong guns, each throwing 100 lb. shot over a range of six miles. The ram will run down ships by driving at them at full speed. If she only does one-half of what may fairly be anticipated from her she will be cheaper to the nation than a dozen sail of the line.—The cost of the hull will be about £230 000 the engines about £75,000, and her fitting for sea about £45,000 more, or £320,000 in all.

The Austrians government has published a return of the sums contributed to the patriotic fund. They amount to 288,253 florins, or 720,000 fr., at the nominal exchange of 2fr., 50c., but only to 500,000fr. at the actual rate of 1fr. 75c. The enthusiasm of the Austrian public in favor of the war does not appear to be very great if these subscriptions may be taken as the measure of its intensity.

The French floating batteries which form part of the squadron of Admiral Bouet Villaumez are the same as those which were employed with great effect at Kinburn, at the mouth of the Dnieper in the Crimean War. They are called the Lave, the Tonnante and the Devastation. Two other floating batteries are being constructed—the Congreve at Brest and the Foudroyante at Cherbourg.

At the moment, says the Paris Siecle, when in all the towns of France where the Austrian prisoners have arrived, they receive marks of interest, and they are treated with the greatest humanity; it is stated on undoubted authority, that during the popular commotion which lately took place at Venice, several young men of the first family were shot by the Austrians, and thirty-four of them set of Germany, to taste the sweet of the carcere duro of MM Metternich and Veuillot. This is not all. Three of Garibaldi's soldiers were shot at Verona, and it has been publicly announced that all who may be taken prisoners will experience the same fate. It is certain that the Austrians would expose themselves to terrible reprisals if the chiefs of the Franco Sardinian army had not given so many proofs of forbearance and moderation.

The Cologne Gazette asserts that the soldiers of the reserve of the Federal Contingent of Luxembourg assembled at Echternach and Diekerch have displayed flags inscribed "Long live Napoleon!" "Italy forever!"

The Grand Duke of Baden has addressed to his army an order of the day, which concludes as follows:

The time for peace and repose has yet arrived, and we may have to impose on ourselves greater sacrifices and to undergo more painful trials than any we have hitherto borne. Hold yourselves, therefore ready to respond to my call and to that under my flag like valiant Germans for the honor of the country.

MISCELLANEOUS ACCOUNTS.

A Turin despatch says that the Sardinian losses at Solferino were very heavy, and mentions among the killed, Generals Mollard, Perrier and Arnaldi, Colonels Beretta and Penot, and Captain Pallavinini, of the "bersaglieri," General Fanti's division greatly distinguished itself.

A Paris letter in the Independence, of Brussels, says:

The Emperor of the French had one of his epaulettes carried away by a shot.

It is stated that not a single Hungarian regiment of either cavalry or infantry was allowed to take part in the failure on the Mincio, the Italian regiment having been already removed out of temptation, and sent to the Tyrol.

A letter from Vienna, in the National Gazette, of Berlin, says:

It is generally believed in well informed circles that the next mail will bring an account of an armistice, which will serve as the basis for negotiations for peace. The same opinion prevails at the Bourse, where prices have improved.

A Berlin letter in the Hamburg News says:

It may be considered as certain that the Prussian Government has opened negotiations with England and Russia, in order to establish a common basis of mediation.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times writing June 28, evening says:

The official reports of the battle will probably appear to-morrow. In the meantime it seems that this time it is to General Niel the Emperor is indebted for the success of the day. Niel, with 35,000 men and two divisions of horse, of Canada. And so it has come to pass that the Americans have been permitted to complete their arrangements to secure the trade with the North West, and to draw the sympathies of the people of Red River towards themselves; while the Canadian government, to aid the Hudson Bay Company in their exclusive and repressive policy, have refused to give even the most moderate encouragement to those who were willing to open up and maintain communications with the settlement through the British territory, the shortest, safest and most convenient route. We may well admire the energy of our American friends. Through their agency, the heavings of a steamboat have been heard amid the forests which skirt the Red River of the North; and the settlers of Selkirk have been started by its shrill note of triumph, just as they deemed themselves deserted by their natural allies and fellow subjects in Canada.

The Buffalo Express, in allusion to this feat, says:

"The application of steam to the navigation of this heretofore secluded stream, is an event of great interest to the entire legion and eminently so to our city. The head of navigation on it is but little over two hundred miles from the western extremity of Lake Superior, and that point is as near the Atlantic by water communication as is the head of Lake Michigan, a fact not generally known. When the productive regions of the Red River and the mighty rivers connecting with it, through Lake Winnipeg, are settled and cultivated, Lake Superior and the lower lakes must form the avenue through which their products will seek the seaboard.

The remarkable fact that the countries west of Lake Superior, away up to the shadow of the Rocky Mountains, possess a climate singularly mild and equable, unlike our Western States, from extremes of heat and cold, is just begining to be known.—When experience fully satisfies the emigrant of that truth, then he will set his face in that direction. Those elderly men who remember the time when Ohio was the western limit of eastern emigration; those young men who recollect when the Pontiac country began to be filled up with eastern emigrants and these youths who call to mind when Illinois and Wisconsin were desert wastes, can easily realize the fact that the vast region of the northwest will soon number its people by the million. The influence of the opening to settlement in this vast country, upon the commerce of the lakes, and upon that of our city, can hardly be realized.—We sit at the gate through which all they have to send off must pass.

The Montreal Herald supplies the following account of the first trip by the new route.

"Mr. James Ross, a resident at Red River, arrived here yesterday evening, having left Fort Garry on the 17th ult.—The steamer Anson Northrupt left the mouth of the Cheyenne for Fort Garry on the 5th June, and was four days on the voyage, stopping at night to permit of wood being cut for the next day's operations.—She took the people of Red River entirely by surprise, they knowing nothing of her approach till they heard the steam whistle. She was greeted with the warmest demonstrations of joy. On the 17th the boat started on her return trip with about twenty-five passengers and a good load of furs.—They found the Northrupt comfortably supplied with staterooms, and were much pleased with the management of the boat. She is 90 feet in length with 22 feet beam, and draws only 14 inches with crew and fuel on board, with passengers and freight she sinks four inches lower. The transit from Fort Garry to Fort Abercrombie occupied eight days, stopping at night as before. At Abercrombie our travellers could only find waggons with ox teams to convey them, but they were promised regular stages on their return, their arrival being unexpected. By team to Swan River occupied six days, and there the travellers took the stage which in two days brought them to St. Paul, and forty-eight hours more by La Cross landed them in Toronto. Altogether they travelled eighteen days, and stopped three days on the road. This is the quickest time which has been made between Red River and Toronto. The fare through was $40. During the whole transit through the American territory, Mr. Ross saw houses all the way, and he speaks strongly of the strides towards our territory which our neighbors are making. With all the advantages which the route by Red River presents, a very few thousand pounds would open a road through our own territory more cheaply, quickly, and conveniently traversed than that Mr. Ross has just passed over. Our government, however, deprives of its mail contract the company which has undertaken to open this route, and permits the Americans to step in before us.

The Death of the King of Sweden and Norway.

A brief telegraphic despatch in the London papers announces the death at Stockholm, July 8, of Oscar, King of Sweden and Norway, after an illness which incapacitated him from taking any active part in the government of his Kingdom since September, 1857.

Joseph Francis Oscar I., King of Sweden and Norway, of the Goths and Wends, was born July 4, 1799, succeeded his father Bernadotte, to the throne in 1844, and was crowned at Stockholm on the 28th of September of the same year. He had married in the year 1823, the Princess Josephine Maximilliae Eugenie, daughter of Eugene, Duke of Leuchtenburg, by whom he has had several children, viz:—Prince Charles Louis Eugene, Duke of Scania, born in 1826, now King of Sweden; Prince Oscar Frederic, Duke of Ostragothe, born in 1829 for several years commander of the Swedish marine forces; Princess Charlotte Eugenie Augusta Amelia Albertina, born in 1830; and the Prince Nicholas Augustus, born in 1831. The eldest son Prince Charles, succeeds to the throne, and will probably take the title of Charles XV. He was married in 1850 to the Princess Wilhelmina Frederick Alexandrina Anna Louise, daughter of the Prince William of the Netherlands, and several children are the issue of this marriage.

The father of the late King, the famous Marshal Bernadotte, married Desiree Clery, daughter of a merchant of Marseilles, and Oscar was the only issue of the marriage. When Bernadotte was elected Crown Prince of Sweden, young Oscar joined with him in abjuring Catholicism and embracing the Lutheran creed. He was placed in the Imperial Lyceum when but nine years of age, and subsequently his education was entrusted to Atterbora, the Swedish poet. In 1818 Charles XIII. died and Bernadotte ascended the throne under the title of Charles XIV. About this time Oscar entered the University of Upsal. After leaving the University the young Prince paid a visit to the Duke of Leuchtenburg, and married his daughter. In 1836 he was appointed Regent on account of the infirm health; and in 1844 on the death of Bernadotte he in turn succeeded to the throne and at the same time to a [illegible] fortune of $2,000,000 francs, which Bernadotte had saved out of a civil list of but 3,000,000f. per annum. He has ruled his kingdom for fifteen years, in comparative quiet, and without any occasion for a display of genius or great ability. He was prepossessing in personal appearance, courteous and affable, mingled freely with the people and as well as his Queen, was very popular. Education and internal improvements have progressed during his reign, but religious intolerance still prevails in Sweden.

Prince Charles, who is now King, has received a purely Swedish education, and his intellectual acquirements are said to be considerable. His kingdom is peaceful and prosperous, and there seems to be no reason why his reign should not be long and happy.

The Pleasures of Knowledge.

"How charming is divine philosophy!
Not harsh and crabbed, as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute,
And a perpetual feast of nectared sweets,
Where no crude surfeit reigns."

So sung Milton two centuries ago, and long before that date Plato had announced that "the world in God's epistle to mankind." It is the grand book in which all may read, and whose pages are so full of varied interest and genial knowledge that the being who, having the power, neglects to study it, surely may be written down an ass, for he deprives himself of an enjoyment such as no other pursuit can give.

We are sometimes inclined to be vexed with our race when we find them all toiling after every vain fancy, some bent upon one ambition, some another, but a minority digging in the deep mine of nature for the grandest of all possessions—Truth. Granted that its gold is not yellow, nor its silver white, for its treasures have not the color of material wealth, but they are as glorious and beauteous as the sparkle of the diamond and as enduring as the hills. Science clothes not her votaries in purple and fine linen, but dresses them in lovely flowers or in iridescent shells, and gives as her reward a contented mind and a pure soul. The poetry of science sometimes flashes in the oration of a professor or in the pages of a book, but her truest epic is written upon all materiality, which proclaims that in all things there is a law which, when known and applied, shall make man happier, better and more truly human.

By the investigation of the laws which govern the objects that are all around us the motions of the planets, the relations of life and health, the destiny of man, and the glory of the Deity, are better understood; and the lighting of a cottage, the building of a palace, or the cooking of a dinner are better performed. We can never be in any position in which knowledge is not of value to us, and we can never prophecy the moment at which we may most require it. Indeed many of us only know that there is more to be known than occurs to us in the daily round of business life, by the discovery that something we do not know is calculated to make us richer or give us more ease. "But," exclaims many a petulant person, "how shall I study without an instructor, or how investigate without apparatus? Foolish notions! the best workman always uses the simplest tools. Have you eyes, ears, nose and hands? Then you are provided with apparatus, and memory is the tablet on which to write down your impressions.—Each one of us is better furnished than a college laboratory or a professor's lecture room, and all that we have to do is to learn the use of our apparatus; and there is no place in the universe where man cannot find some object to interest, some study to pursue. Goldsmith found time to observe nature and record his thoughts, and in glowing language he tells us that "the blushing beauties of the rose, the modest blue of the violet, are not in the flowers themselves but in the light which adorns them. Odor, softness, and beauty of figures are their own but it is light alone that dresses them up in their robes, which shame the monarch's glory." As a concluding incentive to our readers to study for themselves, as well as to read books and scientific periodicals, we will give a quotation from a lecture by Prince Albert of England. "Man," observes this eminent savant, "is approaching a more complete fulfillment of that great and sacred mission which he has to perform in the world. His reason being created after the image of God, he has to use it to discover the laws by which the Almighty governs his creation, and by making these laws his standard of action, to conquer nature to his use—himself being a divine instrument. Science discovers these laws of power, motion, and transformation; industry applies them to the raw material which the earth yields us in abundance, but which becomes valuable only by knowledge."

Oh! that all would study nature more and think of themselves a little less; then we should indeed be a people of kings, whose empire would be the world and whose subjects would be created things.

How the Empress Received the News.

A Paris letter, of the 25th ult., says:—"As the sun burst upon Paris this morning, a courier mounted on one of the Emperor's stout cobs, with knotted tail galloped into the quiet hamlet of St. Cloud; he bore a large letter, which he requested should be handed to the Empress. The drowsy porters told him the Empress must not be disturbed from her slumbers. He insisted that his orders were peremptory—'Immediate delivery.' They repaired to the Imperial chamber and handed to her Majesty the despatch—'Great victory! great battle!' &c. The Empress rose immediately, radiant with emotion and delight, ordered a carriage to be got ready, and drove out at once to the picturesque cottage of Villeneuva l'Etang, to communicate the glad tidings to her charming young friend, the wife of General Fleury. Thence to the Princess Clothilde; to the Palace at Meudon, to wake up the old Marshal Jerome Bonaparte, who started like an aged charger at the sound of the clarion. At every post, every village on the road, the Empress stopped her carriage to share her joy with the soldiers and the people; and long ere she retired from her gladsome errand to toss her boy with wild delight and tell him that his father was a hero, and that he must be one in after years, the guns from the esplanade of the Invalides thundered forth the news from their iron throats, and Paris, already drunk with glory, woke to the consciousness of another victory."

Steamboat Inspection.

The Government will no doubt have learned a lesson by their experience on the Ploughboy. To induce proper Railway Legislation Sidney Smith, [we don't mean that transcendent genius, the P. M. G. of Canada] used to say that it would be necessary to kill a Bishop; and a Canadian Government has been all but drowned before we could succeed in getting a sound system of steamboat inspection carried out. Hundreds of valuable lives have been lost by the criminal negligence [of the government in this matter; and hundreds of victims have been unavenged through the partiality and supineness of the authorities. A striking lesson was needed. May we hope that Messrs. Alleyn, Rose and Macdonald, learned it while trembling upon the iron bound coasts of Lake Superior. The burning of a few hundred of poor Scotch Emigrants, and the drowning of a few score of ordinary people has had no effect; such little matters have not even secured the punishment of the guilty parties; but surely we shall now see more efficient measures taken. Only by such conduct, can the government show their gratitute for escape.—The mercy which was shown to them, they should convey the spirit of to others. An Engineer of Montreal makes the following statement, which shows what criminal recklessness characterizes the present system.

"I have no hesitation in saying that the steamer Ploughboy is wholly unfit, and was never intended for such a route, but was built for a ferry boat between Chatham and Detroit. The engine was taken out of the old Transit and must be from twenty to thirty years old; and with the exception of receiving a new walking beam, the old engine is as it was nine years ago. I made a survey of it for the then proprietor, and reported that it was not worth removing to put into a new vessel. I am therefore not at all surprised that it should have broken down. The old, but true saying, that it is folly to put new wine into old bottles, is carried out to the letter respecting steamboats, but the results are generally alike—the bursting of the bottles and the breaking down of the machinery. If our inspection law is not strong enough to restrain the putting of vessels on routes they are wholly unfit for, the sooner it is amended the better; but after a careful reading of the law I think that it is, and that such vessels as the Ploughboy should have got no certificate, and not been allowed to go on a route that requires the best of vessels with the best of machinery to navigate with safety."

A Chapter of Curiosities in Science.

The water which drowns us as a fluent stream, can be walked upon as ice. The bullet which, being fired from a musket, carries death, will be harmless if ground to dust before being fired. The crystalized part of the oil of roses, so grateful in its fragrance—a solid at ordinary temperatures, though easily volatile—is a compound substance, containing exactly the same elements, and in exactly the same proportions, as the gas with which we light our streets. The tea which we daily drink with benefit and pleasure, produces palpitations, nervous tremblings, and even paralysis, if taken to excess; yet the peculiar organic agent named theine, to which tea owes its qualities, may be taken by itself (as theine, not as tea) without any appreciable effect.—The water which will allay our burning thirst, augments it when congealed into snow; so that Captain Ross declared the natives of the Arctic regions preferred enduring the utmost extremity of thirst rather than attempt to allay it by eating snow.—But if the snow be melted it becomes drinkable water. If melted before entering the mouth, it assuages thirst like water; but when melted in the mouth, it has the opposite effect. To render this paradox the more striking, we have only to remember that ice, which melts more slowly than snow in the mouth, is very efficient in allaying thirst.

There are many other wonderful paradoxes and curiosities in science; a few more of these we subjoin in the form of question and answer:

How much quicker will seeds germinate under a blue glass than when exposed to the full action of light?—Seeds which ordinarily require ten or twelve days for germination, will germinate under a blue glass in two or three.

Why will seeds germinate more rapidly under a blue glass than in any other condition?—Because the blue glass permits the chemical principle of light to pass freely, and excludes in a degree the heat and light.

Why is it impossible to make seeds germinate under a yellow glass?—Because a yellow glass excludes all the chemical influence of the sun's rays.

How do plants acquire the carbon which their structure is in a great measure composed?—They obtain it from carbonic acid which they abstract from the atmosphere under the influence of light.

By whom was the identity of lightning and electricity first established?—By Dr. Franklin, at Philadelphia, in 1752. The manner in which this fact was demonstrated was as follows: Having made a kite of a large silk handkerchief stretched upon a frame, and placed upon it a pointed iron wire connected with the string, he raised it on the approach of a thunderstorm. A key was attached to the lower end of the hempen string holding the kite, and to this one end of a silk ribbon was tied, the other end being fastened to a post; the kite was now insulated, and the experimenter awaited for a considerable time the result with great solicitude; finally, indications of electricity began to appear on the string, and Franklin presenting his knuckles to the key, he raised an electric spark; the rain beginning to descend wet the string, increased its conducting power, and vivid sparks in great abundance flashed from the key.

Why was the kite insulated when Franklin fastened the key to the post by the silk ribbon?—Because the silk was a non-conductor, and would not allow the electricity to pass from it by means of a string to the earth, notwithstanding the use of the silk insulator.

What happened when the experiment was repeated in France?—Streams of electric fire, nine and ten feet in length and an inch in thickness darted spontaneously with loud reports from the end of the string conning the kite. During the succeeding year, Professor Richman, of St. Petersburg, in making experiments somewhat similar, and having his apparatus entirely insulated, was instantly killed.

Is a building more or less liable to be struck when furnished with a good lightning conductor?—Lightning conductors do not, as many suppose, conduct the lightning towards the building upon which they are placed; they simply direct its course and facilitate the passage of the fluid in the most direct way to the earth, when only a discharge must inevitably occur; there is no attraction, but the lightning takes the road which offers the least resistance.

Are lightning conductors protective when no visible discharge takes place?—They are. They possess a very great preventive power, and gradually and silently disarm the clouds by drawing the electric fluid from them, and this process commences as soon as the clouds have approached a position vertically over the rod. Professor Farraday recommends the location of lightning conductors inside rather than on the outside of buildings, and says that the lower end should be set into powdered charcoal.

What is the cause of a red sunset?—The vapor of the air not being actually condensed into clouds, but in just on a point of being condensed. In the same manner if light be transmitted through stone mingled with air, and therefore on the point of condensation, it assumes a deep orange or red color.

What is the cause of a red sunrise?—The vapor in the upper region of the air is just on the point of being condensed.

Why is a red sunset an indication of a fine day to-morrow?—Because, although watery vapor is in the air, it is probably only on the verge of incipient condensation, and not sufficiently so to form rain clouds; and this slowly progressive transition of vast volumes of the air through the temperature of the dew point, can only occur in serene weather at sunset and not at sunrise.

Why is a red and lowering sky at sunrise an indication of a wet day?—The red and lowering appearance of the morning sky, which indicates foul weather, probably indicates such an excess of vapor being present in the whole atmosphere, that clouds are actually forming in the higher regions or upon the point of condensation, which the rising sun cannot disperse.

A New York Forger Caught in Toronto.

On Saturday, information was conveyed to one of the New York detectives, who is at present paying a visit to some friends in this city, that a German named Henry Karples alias J. Levi, had left New York for Toronto, after swindling his employers out of two hundred barrels of flour. It appears that Karples was in the employ of Messrs John and James Hecker, commission merchants, New York. On the 28th June, he forged an order for the flour on his employers in the names of Messrs. Lane and Lawrence, at whose order the flour was stored. By this means he obtained possession of the flour which he sold and with the money he took a trip to Canada, accompanied by some friends, male and female. They landed in Toronto, and put up at the "American," and seemed to enjoy themselves well, spending their money freely. The police authorities in New York sent on a warrant to their officer. This was presented to Mr. Gurnett, who issued a warrant for Karples' apprehension. Mr. Alderman Sherwood, late Chief of Police, being an old acquaintance of the Detective, he placed it in his hands. Mr. Sherwood sent to the station of Sergeant-major Cummings, and both proceeded to the "American" yesterday (Sunday) afternoon, about 6re o'clock. They met Karples' on the first floor, and Cummings having said they wanted a word with him, he immediately attempted to make his escape, aiming several blows at Mr. Sherwood and the officer. He was then informed that he was a prisoner, and forced into a back parlour. Here he again began to act in a most disorderly manner, but soon finding "discretion to be the better part of valour," he quietly submitted and was taken to the station, where he was locked up. He attempted to make his escape out of the cells, but the officer in attendance was a little too smart for him. He will make his appearance at the bar of the Police Court this morning, which will in all likelihood be followed by a trip to New York at the expense of the State. The capture reflects great credit on those engaged.

English Victories at a French REGATTA.

The annual regetta for rowing matches, given by the Paris Regatta Society, came off on the Seine, at St. Cloud, on the 5th inst. Owing to the great development that has taken place here in rowing during the last few years, this regetta is considered quite an event. The best crews from Rouen Havre, Nantes, and other places generally come to dispute the honours of the day against the Parisians; but this year quite an unexpected circumstance occurred, which has produced a sensation that will not be easily forgotten by the French people. An English crew, composed of Thos. White, of Bermondsey, George Driver, of Wardsworth, Robert Bain, of Lambeth, and George Drewitt, of Chelsea, availed themselves of the offer made by Mr. John Arthur, an English gentleman living in Paris and well known as a great promoter of acquatic sports. The prizes offered were for skulls, pairs, fours, and six-oared boats open to all.

GALLIC CRITICISM AT FAULT.

Nothing was known until the previous day that an English crew were going to row; however, the French crews, who know pretty well what English oarsmen can do, soon felt uneasy; but many, on seeing our men row before the race, began to regain a little confidence, it is presumed, from their not exactly understanding the real English stroke, for although they appeared to row well, still it was according to their idea not the thing; in fact, they said the men looked strong, even John Bullish, but that they wanted elan, or fire and energy, such as they had, but what we in England should call action or gesticulation. Some few over-ardent admirers of theirs went so far as to back their energetic or firey friends, feeling convinced that they would crush their English opponents as they would their Arab or Austrian rivals, but the following account of the day's sport will give an idea how things went.

THREE PRIZES FALL TO THE ENGLISH!

The sculling race came off first; an easy affair, the French having withdrawn, Diver and Bain winning the first prizes. Then followed the pair-oared race, eight boats started. The two English pairs came in first, pulled by Thomas White, George Drewitt, Robert Bain, and George Driver; a very good race, the Frenchmen gradually falling off astern after the course was over. Immediately after the pair the above four were off for the four-oared race, and they had to pull against fresh crews. This race was the hardest of the day. A very plucky French crew hung on to the English four, and it was not till the race was two-thirds over that the British pluck showed its superiority, their opponents falling into the background.

THE CROWNING TRIUMPH—WINNING ALL THE LAURELS.

After these successive defeats there was some delay in bringing on the six-oared race, owing to the French crews trying to pick the six best men out of their whole numbers in order to defeat the English, who they began to hope by this time were getting used up; but at last three boats got in line—the English four to complete the number of six, were joined by Messrs Frederick Lowe and John Arthur. Just as the boats were going to start, the news arrived of a great victory over the Austrians—1,000 prisoners, 15,000 killed and wounded, &c., — — was received with immense enthusiasm and shouting, many people crying out to the rowers, "Now, then, beat the English;" "Vive la France!" &c. Off went the gun, away went the English, gradually increasing their distance ahead of the others, when, alas! the floating blade of an oar placed itself across the bow of the boat, ploughing up the water awfully, and strange to say, although one attempted to remove it with his oar, it stuck on. This mishap once caused the boats behind to sweep up, but a tremendous spurt was put on by the English crew, who managed still to keep their boat ahead with the oar blade still clinging on, till at the turn it was knocked away, and an easy run home settled the day's sport. The people seemed quite surprised how the English had managed to keep up under such great exertion without apparent fatigue. The English crews rowed each race in new boats, built by a celebrated London boat-builder.—London paper.

AN ENGLISH PLURALIST.

A certain Rev. Mr. Pretyman, having recently died in England, attention has been called by the press to the preferments lavished upon him by his father, formerly Bishop of Winchester. A correspondent of the London Times furnishes that journal with the following interesting list of the situations held (not filled) by this meek divine:

SIR,—Permit me to supply the blanks in the letter of your correspondent respecting the late Rev. G. Pretyman, Chancellor of Lincoln, &c., from returns supplied to the editor of the Clerical Directory, and corrected in proof by the gentlemen to whom they have reference.

	Annual Income. £	s.	d.
Chancellor of Lincoln, 1814.	1,742	13	3
Prebendal Stall of Stoke, "."	268	0	0
Rector of Westhamstead and Harpenden, 1814.....	1,591	0	0
Perpetual Curate of Nettleham,.....	45	0	0
Rector of Chalfont, St. Giles', 1817.....	859	0	0
Cannon of Winton, 1825...	755	0	0

With four houses for residence.

Thus it will appear that the gross income received during the last 45 years, amounted to upwards of £226,000.

Another supplies a notion of the way in which this enormous amount of money was spent by the late evangelist:

SIR,—"A Churchman" refers to £98,210 netted by the late Canon G. T. Pretyman. Having (gratuitously) collected more than £380, mostly in half-crowns, for Archd'n Wigram's Industrial Schools here, I could not succeed in getting one from this pluralist when I called on him at Winchester; and on asking his father, the late Bishop Tomline, for aid for a Parochial School in this part of his diocese, the Bishop replied to me, from Fardham Castle, that he would give 5s. on condition the books in use were exclusively those of the Christian Knowledge Society.

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—In accordance with my instructions, I have great pleasure in forwarding you an account of the proceedings of a meeting held last evening, at Caisse's Hotel, in this Town, to take the preliminary steps towards the erection, by public subscription, of some suitable monument to the memory of the late Judge of these Counties. You will notice that the subscriptions are limited to 5s. each, as the design is that the tribute of respect to the memory of one whom we all honored when living, and whom we all mourn when dead, should be emphatically a public one.

The character of the monument must depend upon the amount realized. I feel assured that it will not be necessary to urge upon the inhabitants of these Counties, the propriety of at once forwarding their subscriptions to the several committees. It is not often that we are called upon to contribute to objects of this kind; but when the opportunity does occur, we should show that we know how to appreciate real worth. To many of the inhabitants of the Counties the late Judge was known in boyhood, and already had gained their love and esteem; to many more he was known as a faithful and energetic representative of the Counties in Parliament, the first who commanded for them respect and consideration; and to nearly all he was known as an impartial and pain-staking Judge. An all-wise Providence has taken him from us; but it cannot be other than a grateful task to record in some enduring monument, how highly we valued him when among us, how deeply we feel his loss when gone.

Yours very truly,
THOS. WHITE, Jr.
Secretary.

Peterboro', July 22, 1859.

A number of gentlemen met at Caisse's Hotel on Thursday evening, July 21st, for the purpose of taking the preliminary steps towards the erection, by public subscription, of a monument to the late Judge Hall.

Capt. Fraser was called to the Chair, and Mr. White requested to act as Secretary.

The following resolutions were then passed unanimously:

Moved by Mr. Conger, seconded by Mr. Dennistoun,—Resolved, That it is desirable to erect a suitable monument to the memory of the late George Barker Hall, Esq., who in passing through the various changes of a short but useful life, shewed himself a friend to the poor, a faithful Representative, and an impartial judge.

Moved by Mr. Fortye, seconded by Mr. Conger,—Resolved, That in order that every inhabitant of the Counties of Peterboro' and Victoria may have an opportunity of contributing to the funds required for the erection of the said monument, the subscriptions therefore shall not exceed 5s each

Moved by Mr. Sherdan, seconded by Mr. Stephenson,—Resolved, That the following named gentlemen be appointed an executive committee, or committee of management, for the purpose of carrying into effect the object of the meeting, viz: Messrs. R. Dennistoun, R. M. Boucher, Moosom Boyd, W. Sheridan, A. S. Fraser, C. A. Weller, and W. S. Conger.

Moved by Mr. Conger, seconded by Mr. Stephenson,—Resolved, That Messrs. Thos. Fortye, Thos. White, Jun'r, and the mover, prepare an address in accordance with the foregoing Resolutions, and submit the same to this meeting for adoption.

The address of the committee was submitted as follows:—

ADDRESS.

To the public,—The friends and admirers of the late Judge Hall, desirous of paying a justly merited tribute of respect to the memory of that much lamented gentleman and believing that the inhabitants of these Counties generally, would wish to unite in manifesting mark of esteem for one whose short but useful life among them gave ample proofs of his warm friend, the faithful representative and the impartial judge, have determined to erect in his memory by public subscription in shms not to exceed five shillings each—a monument with suitable inscription.

The work to be done under the direction of a committee composed of the following gentlemen, viz: Messrs. Robert Dennistoun, R. M. Boucher, Moosom Boyd, Walter Sheridan, A. S. Fraser, C. A. Weller and W. S. Conger, who shall have power to open books, appoint sub-committees, receive subscriptions, and generally do all such matters and things connected as they may deem meet. It is also understood that the work shall be commenced so soon as the amount to be subscribed therefore shall be ascertained.

Peterboro', 21st July, 1859.

Moved by Mr. Boyd, seconded by Mr. Sheridan,—Resolved, That the Address from the Committee be adopted and published under the direction of the committee of management.

Moved by Conger, seconded by Mr. Fortye,—Resolved, That it be an instruction to the Executive Committee, to open books of subscription in each of the municipalities in the Counties of Peterborough and Victoria, and place the same in the hands of efficient committees, composed of at least three persons, one of whom shall be clerk of the Division Court of that municipality, provided there be such an officer therein. And that it be a further instruction to the said committee to report to the subscribers from time to time upon the progress of the work, and when complete to give due notice thereof.

Moved by Mr. Conger, seconded by Mr. Dennistoun,—Resolved, That the Editors of the local papers in these Counties be requested to publish the proceedings of this meeting and that the Secretary be authorized to send them a copy thereof.

Thanks to the Chairman and Committee were then voted, after which the meeting adjourned.

For the Examiner.

"GABBLINGS OF A GOOSE!"

France, Italy, Austria and England.

A FAINT VOICE FROM A BRITISH AMERICA COLONY, FROM A GREEN-HAND.

Whilst now, we see, read and hear, that in European 'Climes,' a deadly struggle is taking place, amongst three of the most conspicuous and important Nations of the Earth, between whom a feeling of deadly hostility has already unfortunately arisen; it is natural and even perhaps necessary, that the patriotic youth of Great Britain—both in the Colonies and at home—whether they are residing in Canada, Australia, any other dependence of the British Crown—or in the Parent Country itself—should seriously and solemnly enquire, what, if any, action is now at this crisis required at their hands; considering themselves as being entitled to the rank, and having the right to assume, the attitude of future supporters of the British Nation. I would at the same time, draw the attention of the older residents of the Colonies to the necessity on their parts, which exists, towards their active encouragement of our youth now to bestir themselves, as being the natural defenders of the Realm. And for this object, the influence of the fair sex should be reasonably and perhaps earnestly exercised. It is at periods when the male subjects of any country require to be aroused, but happen to be for a time sluggishly inclined, that the women exhibit their power, in awaking, stimulating, and we may say creating patriotic action.

It must be observed too by all, and is evident, that whilst other Nations are for War purposes, apparently marshalling their strength and population, Britannia may require that her sons will prepare, and be able, still as ever, to give to the world unmistaken evidence of her long established and still unshaken power and supremacy. Canada, has already sent to swell the ranks of our national forces, a quota of young soldiers, sufficient to form one Regiment of the line. The standing even now acquired by that Regiment, is highly creditable not only to the Officers and men belonging to it, but even to the Province by which it has been furnished. Still, if not a matter of the highest interest and importance to our remaining young Provincials, they may give a passing attention at the least, to the question, as to whether, here in Canada, they may or may not be required for their own credit, to Volunteer the formation of a further body of the like description; an expressed desire to that effect, would if properly laid before the Government, most probably receive respectful attention.

Thousands of the population of Canada have alr ady enrolled themselves in our Volunteer Rifle Corps, as well as in the Ranks of our Provincial Militia. Altogether it can be safely and with reason considered, that without exerting herself to the full extent of her men and means, or indeed without for that purpose, interfering with or injuring in the slightest degree, her internal resources; Canada now possesses a formidable defensive armed force. But the proportion as to numbers, of these Canadians at present enrolled, is small in comparison with the multitudes the Province is capable of furnishing. Canada as a valuable, and even in its infancy, a gigantic dependence of the Empire, is now required to assume a certain dignity corresponding to her well known importance; this at the present having acquired a magnitude, which, since the days of the Phenecians, has perhaps never been earned by or accorded to any Colony. And if the Parent State, at present, or at any time, feels that in order to preserve its power and influence as a Great Nation, heretofore for centuries, conceded to and enjoyed by her, we her subjects, while claiming the right to share in her commercial successes, should represent ourselves fairly and powerfully in any hour of National peril. If this idea is acknowledged and concededto be correct, the question still remains, is one Regiment, merely, even when it promises to be an effective one, sufficient, numerically considered, to represent our just and important position, and native power.—It may be and is considered with reason, that the attitude at present assumed by the principal European Nations and Races, requires, that all the military feeling which slumbers in the hearts of the sons of the British Isles, should be now awakened and placed on the qui vive.

It should also be remembered, that if it happens that the Imperial Government deems it requisite hereafter to assume an attitude hostile to our late French Ally, we will most undoubtedly have in our midst, Gallic, as well as other foes. If then, unfortunately, Britains might, should be required to be opposed antagonistically, to that of our French neighbors; and, once more in anger towards us, is raised the long known cry of "Aux Armes, mes Enfans," it cannot be forgotten, that beneath our Flags can at any moment be heard, the sharp, world renowned and respected words, "My lads, you know your duty: St. George for Merry England; Forward!" "Hurroah! Feugh a Ballagh!" and "Ding the Slogan in the dorvils legs, an' touch 'em off wi' the shein dhu."

Co spicuous amongst our future national emblems, we hope to see victoriously wave a proud Banner, bearing the symbol of the "Maple Leaf."

Agricultural.

Provincial Exhibition of 1859.

CIRCULAR FROM THE PRESIDENT.

To the President, Directors and Members of the several Agricultural and other Societies and to the Public generally:—

Ladies and Gentlemen—The time for holding the Annual Provincial Exhibition being fixed for the four last days of September next, in Kingston, it is the duty of the President for the time being to follow the Custom of past years, by urging upon the notice of the community and particularly of those portions engaged in Agricultural and Mechanical pursuits, the propriety of aiding and promoting the objects for which the Provincial Agricultural Association was constituted—the encouragement of Agriculture, Arts, and Manufactures.

From the gradual progress perceptible each succeeding year, in every department of the Annual Exhibition, and the good effect produced from the extensive and interesting displays of the Industry and General Productions of the Province, it cannot fail in inciting us to use our best efforts to maintain the exalted position to which it has attained; and from the valuable assistance which it is expected will be rendered by the members of the Board of Arts and Manufactures at the Exhibition of 1859, in connection with the Board of Agriculture, we have an assurance of a still more interesting Exhibition in the Mechanical and Manufacturing Departments.

To the Agriculturist and Horticulturist no wider field for advantageous observation presents itself than the Provincial Exhibition ground, stocked as it always is with Pure Bred Animals of every kind, and the choicest productions of the Field, the Garden and Orchard; as well as the many labor saving and useful Implements now found so necessary for various Agricultural and Horticultural purposes, and so admirably adapted to lessen toil and save expense.

To the Mechanic or Manufacturer, no better opportunity presents itself for the display of his skill, his talent and his enterprise than where honorable competition with his fellow Mechanic and Manufacturer from every section of the Province, is offered to each in his own particular line of business.

To the Artist and Man of Science, the sphere of study is by no means limited.—Ample scope will be found for displaying the talents of the former as well as the scientific research of the latter.

To the Ladies, the Annual Exhibition owes much of its interesting features, as the thronging masses desirous of visiting the department under their special care abundantly testify. No failure of an amply display on their part both of the useful and ornamental is anticipated.

To the public generally, the Annual Exhibition presents a scene of deep interest, and well deserves the cordial support of all classes of society; and from the benifits it has hitherto, it is hoped that those engaged in its management will receive that encouragement and aid which are necessary to ensure a successful issue, and to make the Exhibition of 1859 what it is intended to be, a fair Exposition of the resources of Canada. As the benifits of membership in the Provincial Agricultural Association are not confined to the Western Section of the Province only, but extend to the United Province, a favorable opportunity is thus presented to our Lower Canadian friends of which we trust they will avail themselves by contributing largely from the productions of the Eastern Section of Canada, and thereby greatly increase the general interests of the Exhibition.

In order to ensure the protection of costly articles, and valuable animals, that may be brought to the Exhibition, spacious waterproof buildings, stalls, and pens are now being erected within the grounds, capable of affording accommodation hitherto unequaled, to all classes of exhibitors.

The steamboats and railroads will, during the show week, charge half fair; and the Wharfingers of Kingston, with their usual liberality, will allow all articles and animals intended for Exhibition, to be landed and re-shipped free of charge.

President Prov. Agr'l Association.

PHONOGRAPHY, OR WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six; So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUEL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of FIFTY CENTS DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

"THE CANADIAN PHONETIC PIONEER"

Is a Monthly Journal, devoted to the advocacy of the Reform. Price 25 cents per annum.

Manufacturers, Mechanics and Inventors.

The Scientific American

TO BE ENLARGED!

A NEW VOLUME—NEW SERIES,

TO COMMENCE ON JULY 2d, 1859.

Instead of 416 pages, the yearly volume, Enlarged Series, will contain eight hundred and thirty-two pages of valuable reading matter, useful and instructive to all classes.

THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN is published weekly in quarto form, suitable for binding, and the numbers for a single year contains information in regard to new inventions, Machinery, all branches of Manufacturing processes, Agricultural Implements, Engineering, Millwrighting, Iron Manufacture, chemistry; in fact, almost every industrial pursuit receives more or less attention in its columns.

All Patent claims officially published every week, as reported from the Patent Office; and for

INVENTORS AND PATENTEES

It contains information not to be obtained elsewhere, and which no mechanic, inventor or patentee can well do without.

As a Family Journal it has no superior for real practical utility, since in its columns will be found useful practical receipes.

Careful attention will be given, from time to time, to reports of the Metal, Lumber and other Markets.

Every number will contain fifteen pages and forty-eight columns of matter, with several illustrations of patented machines and other engravings, comprising in a single year about

SIX HUNDRED ORIGINAL ENGRAVINGS.

With the Enlarged Series is presented an opportunity to subscribe not likely to occur again for many years. It will be like commencing a new work—Vol. 1, No. 1, new Series

Send in your subscriptions without delay, as to begin the new volume—July 2 next.

Terms $2 a Year—$1 for Six Months.

Southern, Western and Canadian money or Post Office stamps taken at par for subscriptions. Canadian subscribers will please to remit twenty-six cents extra on each year's subscription, to pre-pay postage.

A liberal discount to clubs. A prospectus giving full particulars of the inducements for clubs, with specimen copies of the paper, and a pamphlet of information concerning the procuring of Patents may be had gratis, by addressing

A Midnight Alarm.

—Fire! fire! fire! Rumbled the sound heavily upon the silence of the night:—With what startling effect it fell upon the ear of the sleeper, as, roaring from the great chamber, he hastily quits the bed, and, hurrying to the window, throws it up to learn whence comes the cry startling them. How solemn the sound of the great alarm bell, as it booms forth its deep toned peal.—How noisily and wildly the bells rattle forth their quota to the general confusion. How fast the patient firemen fumble by, anxious to be the first at his post in the discharge of his self imposed and noble duty, and how clear his well-known cry of 'Turn out! turn out!' sounds upon the midnight air.—But see you lurid light, that throws its red glare over the horizon, and pales the brilliancy of the very stars. Louder and louder boom the heavy bells, and faster and faster rattle the tiny ones, in their efforts to rouse the sleeping city. There is a large fire, so let us take hold of the rope of this engine just passing, and contribute our mite to subdue the conflagration. Rattle, rattle, away we go over the rough stones, while the foremost hearty cry of 'altogether men, altogether,' is responded to by his followers with a 'jump her off, jump her off,' in soul stirring tones that make each feel himself a giant of strength, and strain every nerve in the generous strife. Rattle we go over the frozen pavement; and well each knows his step must be firm, for a stumble might cost his life. But while the daring firemen reckn of danger. The sound of the alarm bell is in his ears, and the lurid glow is over the heavens, so away we rattle, intent only on being soon engaged with the fiery enemy. And now as we turn this corner, what a scene of grandeur meets the eye. How surely the crackling flame leaps through the windows and out from the roof. What dense volumes of smoke rise from out of the fiery furnace, and floating away towards the east, look like rolling clouds of gold, as their billows reflect back the red glare of the flames. What myriads of dancing sparks are flying to the very heavens apparently, and whirling away in innumerable graceful circles—flames and clouds and sparks, forming a spectacle of gorgeousness, the painters art might vainly try to rival.

But we have no eyes now to view the magnificent scene—no ears to hear the crackling flames, for a cry piercing and shrill, breaks out upon the midnight air—a cry wrung from the very heart by agony the most intense:

'Help! help! Oh! save my child!'

Hark! how hushed and still is everything save the noise of the raging element.—How dread that fearful cry strikes upon every sense, causing the blood to curdle with a freezing sensation around every manly heart. How riveted is every eye upon that female form, as she holds her darling child far out from yon high window How more than beautiful she looks, with her night robe loosely floating around her fair form, her dark hair falling in glossy waves about her shoulders— every feeling of self forgotten, and every pulsation of her heart beating for the safety of her child.—What a magnificent picture they present as they are shown in bold relief against that bright background of fire. See the struggling babe, as the mother holds it imploringly forth, with its disheveled curls waving round its face of utmost beauty, and its tiny hand thrown out in a vain endeavor to clasp them around its mothers neck. Louder and more piercing ring those fearful cries for help, and nearer and nearer approach the pitiless flames. How wildly fixed is that despairing mothers gaze upon the faces of those gallant men beneath, as, from a multitude of hearts, there goes up an assurance of aid for herself and child. Hark! to the hoarse cry through half a score of trumpets, for 'Ladders!—ladders!—ladders this way!' But, oh, horror! No ladders have yet arrived and not a moment may be lost for the flames are now leaping at the hem of that mothers garment, and louder, and more agonising still, rings out her cry for aid.

But hold—what means this awful silence? Why is every gaze withdrawn from the fearful picture above? See that daring fellow as he clings to that frail water pipe. Slowly but surely he makes the toilsome and dangerous ascent. He has reached the second story. The silence is yet unbroken save by the crackling flames and the woman's piercing shriek. He has reached the third story—he is almost at the eaves.—Why blanch the faces of all that multitude with terror? Why breaks that saddening groan out of a thousand throats? God of mercy! the fastenings of that frail pipe are tearing from the wall, and the noble fellow must be dashed from that fearful height when the pavement below. What means that cheering cry. He has caught the top of the window shutter, and now swings himself in beside that despairing mother. What a wild glad shout goes up as he seizes the infant from the mother's grasp, and her hands are clasped in silent prayer.—But he seems to be only saved from one horrid death to die another yet more dreadful.—But he has nerves of steel and judgement quick and clear. The flames are leaping from his very feet, and the scorching heat is blistering his skin.

'Quick, boys,' falls from his lips, in clear and manly tones, 'quick throw me the drag rope of the engine.'

A hundred hands are busy at the rope, a thousand voices urge them on to speed.

A noble fellow stands beneath the window, the coiled rope within his grasp, and measuring with eagle eye the distance to the window above.

'Are you ready?' rises from his lips.

'All ready,' comes the answer from above, and the call is answered with almost superhuman strength. 'Three cheers for boys—three well earned.'

With the speed of thought through his mind the brave fellow frames his plan. With his disengaged hand he takes from his waist the belt he fastened round the station, the strong brazed corner window. Hooked and buckled round the unconscious infant. The three men stands upon the window sill, with his strong arm around the mother, who holds her babe now clasped tightly to her breast. Her eyes are closed—the silence hath upon the fearful climax, but her lips move in an earnest prayer goes up to heaven.—The gallant fellow throws his body forward more bravely, as he throws the right around his other arm, and the band grasps it with a nervous clutch. God help them! they have left the window, and the strong rope sustains nobly the double load. Slowly but surely they descend, and the brave fellow is about to step on the ground with the precious burden, when his foot slips, and he falls to the ground with the mother and child. The rope is broken, and the brave fellow lies insensible in a pool of blood flowing from a wound in the head.

But let us not linger upon the gory and mangled but death was denied to the brave, for about the mother and child, for in a moment a crowd of people are around them, and a cloak of some one is thrown around the mother, and the child is taken from her arms, and borne into a house.

But the brave fellow upon the gory and mangled but death was denied to the brave, for about the mother and child, for in a moment a crowd of people are around them, and a cloak of some one is thrown around the mother, and the child is taken from her arms, and borne into a house.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 4th, 1859.

The Separation.

To-morrow is the day appointed for taking the vote on the By-law to separate the Town from the jurisdiction of the Counties of Peterborough and Victoria. Little interest apparently is felt in the result; this should not be the case, inasmuch as it is an important matter, and one which every ratepayer ought to be prepared to give his decided opinion upon. We stated when the By-law was first introduced that if the report of the Committee was correct, and if the Town was suffering from an unjust taxation by its connection with the County the sooner a separation took place the better. We say so still, but there are circumstances connected with the introduction of the By-law, which it would be well the rate-payers should consider. Not a word was spoken of a separation, not a syllable about unjust County taxation was heard in the Town Council until after the last session of the Counties' Council. A member of the latter council, the deputy reeve of Peterboro', was the individual who introduced the By-law into the Town Council; and any person who paid the slightest attention to the conduct of the deputy reeve in the Co. Council will easily perceive the spirit in which this By-law was framed. After making himself so disgustingly officious as to be a subject of ridicule and contempt to the other members of that body, and after being upset in his petty scheme of the Registry office, he resorts to this as a means of punishing the other members of the united council for their (in his eye) disobedience, and not that the rate-payers of the Town might be benefitted by the change. We venture to assert that if the purposes of the deputy reeve had been carried out in the Counties' Council no such By-law as that now before the rate-payers would be in existence. So much for the introduction of the By-law.

Aside from its connection with the deputy reeve the object of the By-law is good, and no opposition will likely be made to its passage. Although we are not prepared to certify the estimates of the special committee correct entirely, we are perfectly satisfied the saving to the Town would be considerable if separated from the County.

Meeting.

A meeting of the business men of the Town was held in the Town Hall last evening for the purpose of considering the state of the trade of the Town.

The meeting was large and respectably attended.

Jas. Stevenson, Esq., was called to the chair, and Wm. Eastland, Esq., requested to act as secretary.

The Chairman having called the meeting to order, and stated the object for which the meeting was called,

Mr. R. Nichols moved, seconded by Mr. J. Campbell,

That whereas the Market By-law now in force, has been found to operate injuriously to the interests of the Mercantile and Trading community, and is also complained of as being unnecessarily harrassing and vexatious to the country population. And whereas the correct principle would be to create a market as nearly free from impost as practicable, and thereby encourage a large assemblage of persons for the sale and interchange of rural productions.

It is therefore advisable and expedient for the promotion of such objects and to abate the evils complained of, to amend Market By-law No. — by excluding therefrom the following articles and permitting a free interchange of the same, at any time, and place, and in any manner, the seller and buyer may deem for their mutual interests viz:

1. Wheat,
2. Wool,
3. Butter in kegs,
4. Hides and Skins,
5. Pork in Barrels.

Mr. Haslitt moved that the words "and all coarse grains" be added to the foregoing resolution, which was agreed to. Mr. Nichols' resolution was then put and carried.

It was then moved by Mr. Cluston, and seconded by Mr. Millard,

That the resolution just passed seeking to amend the Market By-law be agreed to, and that Messrs be requested to take charge of the same, and on the first meeting of the Town Council attend on behalf of this meeting, and urge the amendment of the said By-law, as sought for both by Town and Country, and especially soliciting the attention of the Council to a memorial of the business men of the Town, presented to the Council at the passing of the By-law.

—Carried.

The meeting then dispersed.

CONCERT—A grand treat for our musical friends is in reserve. On Thursday evening next Messrs. Crowther and Heathfield, aided by several distinguished musicians, intend giving a grand Concert of vocal and instrumental music in the Town Hall. The reputation of these gentlemen as musicians is well known, and the simple announcement of the fact is all that is necessary to secure a bumper house.

WARNING—John Wilkinson, a grocer at the north end of the town, was brought before the Mayor on Tuesday last, charged with selling [illegible] liquors without a license. The case was fully sustained and Mr. W. fined $20 with costs. This may not be a warning to others; therefore it will be [illegible]

OUR RAILWAYS.

It is evident that a change has come over the dreams of the Review, relative to the competing lines of Railway running to our Town. Who can guess the reason of that change? The [illegible] fiasco, that we have made and blundered in constructing the Millbrook Branch Railway, but to own this fact, he suggests that we should have [illegible] traffic, as might have been ascertained with our money. It would indeed be a hard matter to show what benefit the Town of Peterboro' has derived from their $30,000 expended on the Branch. The only parties that have hitherto derived or that are likely for the future to derive the smallest pecuniary benefit, are Messrs. Fowler & Co., who, if we are to believe the friends of the Branch, have traded to some purpose on the capital of poor duped Town. As to the notion of Mr. Benton, which the Review treats as a capital practical joke, it seems to us by no means improbable that if the Council treat it as the Review thinks right, they may indeed find it a rather unpleasant practical joke, at their individual expense. Are not the Council, we would ask, the Guardians of the interests of the Town, and is it not their duty to look after those in debted to the Town. Can they say, that they are fulfilling this duty by taking no means to secure the debt due by Fowler on his Mortgage to the Town. We do not say that they are to distrain the rolling stock, to do this they have no right, as we are not the Landlords of Mr. Fowler, he holds his lease from the Port Hope and Lindsay Company, but we are the Mortgagees for a valuable consideration of the Leasehold property acquired by Fowler in the Road, and why not sue and recover judgment against him for the interest due us, like any other mortgagee—can it be said that Fowler has no property against which after judgment execution could issue,—surely not. Then let our Council, to clear themselves, do all they can to secure the debt, not as they would against a debtor of their own, and then they will be free from blame,—otherwise they will most assuredly, it appears to us, be liable for neglect of duty, and for loss arising from such neglect. It will not do to say with the Review that taking any steps will shut up the road—that we believe absurd—it may shut up Fowler, but the branch will still be run, if not with pecuniary benefit to the town, with at least, as much as it has hitherto done, or is likely in its present hands—and surely no one will pretend that one half worn locomotive is sufficient to work the branch to our benefit even as to traffic. As to the remarks of our contemporary on the energetic representative of Northumberland, all we can say is that it is a happy thing that we have such energetic men—and once the Review thought the same, especially about the time that the said gentleman and a few equally energetic took up the Chemong Lake Road Charter that had been allowed to lie dormant till it was within a few months of expiring for want of energetic men either at Port Hope or among ourselves. The benefits to flow from that road, and they appear to us great, we will owe entirely to the representative of Northumberland and his friends who started the road, carried it on so far. in times of great depression, and will, we firmly believe, never slack till it touches the waters of Chemong Lake. The sneer therefore, or worse insinuation of trickery thrown out at the representative of Northumberland by our compo ary might well we think have been spared. Those who have watched the commencement and progress of the two Railroad Companies will have little difficulty in deciding to which Peterboro' is most indebted—the one who began, carried on, and completed their road without our aid, or even our sympathy—or the other who from the beginning to the end practised one long and undeviating system of deception and untruth, during the town under false promises, and undertakings, never intended to be fulfilled, to hand over £38,000 towards the work. Look at the result, the first is now doing a business large beyond precedent, to the satisfaction of all interested, with the certain prospect of making the much decried Rice Lake bridge one of the best portions of the Road, and shortly to connect Chemong Lake and the back country with Peterboro' and Cobourg,—the other limping along on one foot with hardly enough to do to pay expenses, no present prospects for the better in future, and running into a Road at Millbrook, the bridges on which are sufficient to try any nerve, and cannot last forever. The contrast is too humiliating to our town to be dwelt upon.

THAT BY-LAW—Much satisfaction has been expressed by the public at our course in publishing the answers of the business men of the Town in reference to the questions of the Market By-law Committee.—Many facts have been brought to the public notice which never would otherwise have been made known, and placed the grounds of opposition to the By-law in their true light, and prove the representations of certain individuals in regard to the object of opposition, incorrect.

We have been permitted to publish the following:

PETERBOROUGH, July 13th, 1859.

J. Edwards, Esq, Town Clerk:

SIR,—In compliance with the request contained in your circular of the 11th inst., we beg to state in answer to your 1st and 2nd questions to say that we think it would be much better to abandon the fees altogether. There can be no objection to parties requiring the use of the scales paying for the same.

3rd. We think the present plan of selling the Market does decidedly objectionable.

4th. We see no reason why one article should be exempted from the operation of the law any more than another, but we do see reasons why a deduction should be made between parties who are simply supplying regular customers, or delivering produce in fulfilment of previous contracts, and parties who are peddling, or loitering about the street. The dividing line between these classes, in our opinion, would not be difficult to define.

We do not think that the present by-law or any other, in any degree similar, can be practically carried out, for the simple reason that no considerable portion of the community has ever felt the necessity of such an enactment, but on the contrary the majority look upon it as arbitrary, tyrannical, and unjust. And consequently their sympathies are with the evaders, instead of the executors of the law.

We are your obedient servants

A philosopher was asked what time he required to find happiness in a married life. "Three months," was the reply. "Three months!" exclaimed the astonished inquirer, "why, that is a short time." "Not so short," replied the philosopher, "as you think for it takes a man three months to find out that he is a fool."

CRICKET.

The return Match between the Lindsay and Peterborough Cricket Clubs, was played on Friday, the 29th July, on the ground of the former. The Lindsay eleven took the bat and scored in the first innings 66, and in the 2nd 14. The Peterborough eleven made in their 1st innings 74, and had 6 runs to make in the 2nd, which they did without losing a wicket, thus gaining the match with five wickets to go down. The weather was most favourable, and the number of spectators large. The Lindsay Ladies like those of our own Town on similar occasions, turned out in goodly numbers to witness the game, as well as contributed a most excellent and substantial lunch for the Cricketers, which they relished exceedingly. The play on the whole was good, and it is to be hoped that the Clubs will enjoy many a friendly game together. The score was as follows:

P. S.—The Committee of the Peterborough Club desire to announce, that a Match will be played here, on Thursday the 11th inst., between the Cobourg and Peterborough Clubs. Wickets to be pitched at 10 a. m.

The Review is ingenious. To expect to hold our contemporary with the naked truth would be something like attempting to catch an eel with the naked hand. The Review is well aware that Mr. Burnham in his extraordinary effort to carry a vote of censure upon Mr. Conger at a late Council meeting, entered upon a long array of figures to show that the new Town Hall would not cost, as Mr. Conger had stated, from £7,000 to £10,000, but that it could be built for £5,000, and that the interest would be £300 per annum; and he is also aware that Mr. White on taking the floor strongly sustained Mr. Burnham's arguments. It was while doing so Mr. Heathorn put the very proper question in reference to the discount on debentures, (which up to that point had not been mentioned), and that Mr. White distinctly named 25 per cent as the rate, as we stated two weeks ago. But Mr. White allowed himself to be so much inflamed by excitement, in lashing his old friend and benefactor for refusing to assist him in perpetrating one of the greatest impositions that was ever attempted upon any community (we allude to the scheme to place the Registry office, with all its valuable and important documents in a flimsy block of buildings in the Market square), that he had no distinct recollection of what he did say in the storm of words. However as he seems anxious to correct himself we will let him tell his own story:—"The Review now urges the "Council to erect a building to cost "£4,000 in cash, and he tells them honestly" save the mark, as if he could do anything honestly wherein the Market Block is concerned, "that £5,000 in debentures may "be required to accomplish the work."—Again, "If our contemporary is as good at "counting as he is at shuffling, he will find "that [£300] to be precisely the interest "on £5,000 debentures." Well, it does not require a very elaborate knowledge of figures to work out that proposition, but we cannot for the life of us produce £4,000 by deducting 25 per cent from £5,000. Please tell us, Th— (beg pardon, we had almost infringed on our neighbor's 'privilege') Mr. Review by what rule this can be wrought?

But we shall not continue this controversy. We know the town has no idea of adding even £5,000 to the large debt already standing against it, nor has it any intention of throwing away another £1,000 in the shape of discount in raising money for the purpose of ornamenting the Market square to the benefit of a few individuals.

We may remark, in passing, that the reference to the new School House is unfair. Our contemporary does not know what it has, nor what it will cost; he may know the contract price, but that will not give it. The Montreal Bank, a small but substantial building on the Market square cost £3,800, and the new Town Hall in Cobourg cost over £19,000.

MACKENZIE'S MESSAGE.—We have received a blank sheet from W. L. Mackenzie which it is his desire should be filled with names of parties wishing to subscribe for his journal. We will be most happy to receive names of intending subscribers.

Money and time are the heaviest burdens of life, and the subscription of sportsmen are those have most of either than they know how to use.

A philosopher was asked what time he required to find happiness in a married life. "Three months," was the reply. "Three months!" exclaimed the astonished inquirer, "why, that is a short time." "Not so short," replied the philosopher, "as you think for it takes a man three months to find out that he is a fool."

THE PEACE.

BERLIN, July 19.—The Prussian Gazette publishes a leading article in defence of the attitude taken by Prussia during the last few months, and endeavours to prove that its policy has prevented an universal war. The article lays the chief stress upon the fact that a real and substantial basis for joining in the war was wanting. The article goes on thus:—"Prussia can draw her sword for German and Prussian interests, but not for maintaining or re-establishing a state of affairs in Italy which Austria herself has recognized as not maintainable; nor for sustaining isolated articles of the treaties of 1815 (night, for Feststellung einzelner Bestimmungen der Vertrage von 1815.") The article further says—"The proposals for mediation made by Prussia were far more favourable than the preliminaries of peace which have now been agreed upon." The article concludes—"Prussia has no occasion to be dissatisfied with the unexpected turn matters have taken. Whilst discontinuing her military measures, she awaits the further development of affairs with calmness."

The following order of the day to the army has been published to-day:—"At the moment when war broke out between the two neighbouring great Powers, I had ordered the army to be placed in readiness for war, in order to maintain that position of power which belongs to Prussia. The change which threatened us then is over. While you were still marching to occupy positions I had ordered for you, the belligerent Powers suddenly concluded peace. Your advance had shown our firm resolution to maintain our frontiers and those of Germany inviolate, whatever might be the destinies of a war. You have shown the readiness I had expected from you, and have maintained in general a dignity worthy of the name of Prussia. You have made many personal sacrifices, and I express to you my full satisfaction.

THE PRINCE REGNT OF PRUSSIA."

Paris, July 18.

A conference to settle the affairs of Italy has just been arranged at St. Cloud.

The early part of next month is spoken of as the time at which the representatives of the parties interested will assemble.

"The Emperor of Austria has promised the Emperor Napoleon that popular reforms shall take place throughout the Austrian empire, but his Majesty gives no hopes of withdrawing from the Concordat, which gives so much trouble and offence in Hungary and elsewhere.

"Addresses are arriving in Turin from all parts of Italy, praying for a united Italy headed alone by King Victor Emmanuel.

I have not received any letter to-day from Italy; but I learn no alarming news has reached Paris by telegraph. Florence to-day was tranquil.

"In the sittings of the Diet, yesterday, Austria communicated the preliminaries of peace, and proposed to place the Federal contingents and fortresses on a peace footing. The Austrian press attacks England and Prussia about the results of the war.

"The Opinione says Count Cavour resigned because the war had terminated without his programme for the independence of Italy being completed.

The Tuscan division left Goito on the 6th for Volta. On arriving at the latter place, General Ulloa received notice that, as the division ceased to belong to the 5th corps of the French army, it now passed under the immediate orders of King Victor Emmanuel.

Arrival of the Kangaroo.

St. Johns, Nfld., July 30.

The steamship Kangaroo, from Liverpool on the 20th, via Queenstown on the 21st inst., passed Cape Race last evening. She was boarded by the News Vatch of the Associated Press and the following summary of her news obtained:

The dates from Liverpool and London by the Kangaroo are to noon of the 21st inst., by telegraph to Queenston. The news is therefore one day later, but not of particular import nce.

It was settled that the Peace Conference would meet at Zurich in about ten days.—M. Bourqueny would represent France, and Count Colmaredo would perform the same office on the part of Austria.

On the Paris Bourse the rents closed on Wednesday at 68¼.

The Bombay mail of June 23rd had been telegraphed; but the news was quite unimportant.

The Kangaroo has 175 passengers and a large cargo for New York.

Liverpool, 21st July, noon.—Breadstuffs are quiet, and sales unimportant. Provisions are dull. Other articles generally unchanged.

Consols are quoted at 95¼ for money and account, but the market dull.

Cheap Excursions from the Old World to Canada.

We find the following paragraph in the Liverpool Albion:—

"Owing to the disturbed state of the continent, it is natural to suppose that a large number of those who annually travel thither for health, relaxation or pleasure, will forego their accustomed excursions in that direction and seek some new scenes.—A trip across the Atlantic is now—so rapid is the conveyance, and so luxurious the accommodation—divested of its previous difficulties, while the small expenditure which it involves places it within the reach of persons of very moderate means. We perceive that Messrs. Allan Brothers, (of the Montreal Ocean Steam line) with a view to meet the convenience and wishes of excursionists, have arranged to supply return tickets, which will be available until the close of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, (12th Oct. next) at a considerable reduction upon the ordinary fares.—Tourists will thus have an opportunity, particularly if they avail themselves of the line of through steamers which are on the lakes of wintersing some of the most magnificent scenery in the world, including the falls of Niagara, "the lake of the one thousand Islands," the rapids of the St. Lawrence, and many other objects of striking interest. The facilities for long-route travelling, and the cheapness of conveyance, too, which prevail in Canada and the States and when once secross the water, no doubt tempt to a complete tour of the States, thus which certainly nothing of its kind is more pleasant or full of pride."

HAPPY EFFORT.

A Wesleyan minister of the West, who lived on a small salary, was greatly troubled in getting his quarterly instalments. He at last told the non-paying trustees that he must have his money, or his family must starve for the necessaries of life.—"Why," replied the steward, "if you preach as money I thought you preached for the love of souls for." "Sir," replied the minister, "I can't make parish of souls pay my debts. I would advise a different mode to you if I were in your place." "Then pray tell me," said the steward, "how I am to get my money?" "Why," replied the minister, "I would go to the parish and preach a sermon."

The change which threatened us then is over. While you were still marching to occupy positions I had ordered for you, the belligerent Powers suddenly concluded peace. Your advance had shown our firm resolution to maintain our frontiers and those of Germany inviolate, whatever might be the destinies of a war. You have shown the readiness I had expected from you, and have maintained in general a dignity worthy of the name of Prussia. You have made many personal sacrifices, and I express to you my full satisfaction.

THE PRINCE REGNT OF PRUSSIA."

Paris, July 18.

A conference to settle the affairs of Italy has just been arranged at St. Cloud.

The early part of next month is spoken of as the time at which the representatives of the parties interested will assemble.

"The Emperor of Austria has promised the Emperor Napoleon that popular reforms shall take place throughout the Austrian empire, but his Majesty gives no hopes of withdrawing from the Concordat, which gives so much trouble and offence in Hungary and elsewhere.

"Addresses are arriving in Turin from all parts of Italy, praying for a united Italy headed alone by King Victor Emmanuel.

I have not received any letter to-day from Italy; but I learn no alarming news has reached Paris by telegraph. Florence to-day was tranquil.

"In the sittings of the Diet, yesterday, Austria communicated the preliminaries of peace, and proposed to place the Federal contingents and fortresses on a peace footing. The Austrian press attacks England and Prussia about the results of the war.

"The Opinione says Count Cavour resigned because the war had terminated without his programme for the independence of Italy being completed.

The Tuscan division left Goito on the 6th for Volta. On arriving at the latter place, General Ulloa received notice that, as the division ceased to belong to the 5th corps of the French army, it now passed under the immediate orders of King Victor Emmanuel.

Arrival of the Kangaroo.

St. Johns, Nfld., July 30.

The steamship Kangaroo, from Liverpool on the 20th, via Queenstown on the 21st inst., passed Cape Race last evening. She was boarded by the News Vatch of the Associated Press and the following summary of her news obtained:

The dates from Liverpool and London by the Kangaroo are to noon of the 21st inst., by telegraph to Queenston. The news is therefore one day later, but not of particular import nce.

It was settled that the Peace Conference would meet at Zurich in about ten days.—M. Bourqueny would represent France, and Count Colmaredo would perform the same office on the part of Austria.

On the Paris Bourse the rents closed on Wednesday at 68¼.

The Bombay mail of June 23rd had been telegraphed; but the news was quite unimportant.

The Kangaroo has 175 passengers and a large cargo for New York.

Liverpool, 21st July, noon.—Breadstuffs are quiet, and sales unimportant. Provisions are dull. Other articles generally unchanged.

Consols are quoted at 95¼ for money and account, but the market dull.

Cheap Excursions from the Old World to Canada.

We find the following paragraph in the Liverpool Albion:—

"Owing to the disturbed state of the continent, it is natural to suppose that a large number of those who annually travel thither for health, relaxation or pleasure, will forego their accustomed excursions in that direction and seek some new scenes.—A trip across the Atlantic is now—so rapid is the conveyance, and so luxurious the accommodation—divested of its previous difficulties, while the small expenditure which it involves places it within the reach of persons of very moderate means. We perceive that Messrs. Allan Brothers, (of the Montreal Ocean Steam line) with a view to meet the convenience and wishes of excursionists, have arranged to supply return tickets, which will be available until the close of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, (12th Oct. next) at a considerable reduction upon the ordinary fares.—Tourists will thus have an opportunity, particularly if they avail themselves of the line of through steamers which are on the lakes of wintersing some of the most magnificent scenery in the world, including the falls of Niagara, "the lake of the one thousand Islands," the rapids of the St. Lawrence, and many other objects of striking interest. The facilities for long-route travelling, and the cheapness of conveyance, too, which prevail in Canada and the States and when once secross the water, no doubt tempt to a complete tour of the States, thus which certainly nothing of its kind is more pleasant or full of pride."

HAPPY EFFORT.

A Wesleyan minister of the West, who lived on a small salary, was greatly troubled in getting his quarterly instalments. He at last told the non-paying trustees that he must have his money, or his family must starve for the necessaries of life.—"Why," replied the steward, "if you preach as money I thought you preached for the love of souls for." "Sir," replied the minister, "I can't make parish of souls pay my debts. I would advise a different mode to you if I were in your place." "Then pray tell me," said the steward, "how I am to get my money?" "Why," replied the minister, "I would go to the parish and preach a sermon."

The British Army from 1800 to 1859-60.

A return has been laid before Parliament of "The number of officers and men, distinguishing each arm of the service—cavalry, infantry, horse and foot artillery, and engineers—annually from 1800 to 1858, both years inclusive, stating the numbers serving at home, in the colonies, and in India; [the enrolled pensioners, and embodied militia, and volunteers; and the amount annually voted for these services, distinguished effective and non-effective services." This return enables us to trace the cost, numbers and distribution of the whole British army from the commencement of the present century to the year 1858; and the army estimates for 1859-60 enable us to bring it down to the present time.

The first two years comprised in the present return, namely, 1800 and 1801, were years of war with Republican France. In the first of these years the cost of the army was £17,482,613 and in the second it had increased to £16,991,019. In the second of these years, the whole military force at home, in the colonies, and in India was as as follows:—

Cavalry	26,846
Infantry	147,187
Horse artillery	1,136
Foot artillery	7,544
Engineers	931
Embodied militia	70,647
	254,291

The succeeding year, 1802, and a portion of the year 1803, were periods of peace, or rather of truce, the Treaty of Amiens having been entered into in the former year, and the war having broken out again with redoubled fury in 1803. The estimates of 1802 were reduced to £12,315,848, and those for 1803 to £13,094,703. The military force for 1802 was the most remarkable in its composition ever known, the regular troops had been reduced, at the beginning of the year, to a peace establishment, whilst the volunteers were suddenly swollen, in anticipation of the invasion by France, to 467,154 officers and men. The following was the composition of the army in 1803:—

Cavalry	17,663
Infantry	98,499
Horse artillery	989
Foot artillery	8,650
Engineers	882
Volunteers	463,134
Total	589,807

The war which re-commenced in 1803 raged with indescribable fury till the year 1815. During that time the efforts of England to organize a powerful army continually increased, until the army which triumphed in the Peninsula and at Waterloo had been formed. In 1815 the amount expended on the army amounted to the enormous sum of £43,256,260. The numbers and composition of the army in that memorable year were as follow:—

Cavalry	27,011
Infantry	198,749
Horse artillery	1,873
Foot artillery	16,968
Engineers	2,512
Embodied militia	23,365
Volunteers	111,153
Total	381,631

The reduction in the number of the volunteers arose from the cessation of all fears of invasion. The victories of Nelson had long before swept all hostile fleets from the ocean, and France so far in being in a condition to invade other countries, was in 1813 1814, and 1815 unable to defend her own soil from the invading armies of the allies.

From the year 1816 to the year 1854, when the war with Russia commenced, England enjoyed uninterrupted peace, and the army estimates declined year by year till 1836, when they were at their lowest point, namely £7,940,189. The numbers and composition of the army that year were as follow:—

Cavalry	10,887
Infantry	90,152
Horse artillery	616
Foot artillery	6,512
Engineers	1,202
Volunteers	19,287
Total	128,656

From this time to the year 1853, the army estimates never rose to 10 millions sterling.

In 1854 this country again found itself engaged in a serious war, namely, that with Russia. In 1855, which was the year of the greatest expenditure, the army estimates had risen to £28,670,492. The numbers and composition of the army in 1856, under this large expenditure were as follow;

Cavalry	17,336
Infantry	176,824
Horse Artillery	2,047
Foot artillery	20,233
Engineers	3,788
Enrolled Pensioners	16,763
Embodied militia	57,851
Volunteers	15,340
Total	321,182

The years 1857 and 1858 were years of peace, and in the latter year the army estimates declined to £11,577,755. Unfortunately the breaking out of the war on the continent has rendered it necessary to make a great edition to these estimates for the current year 1859-60. The army estimates for that year amount to £13,299,000.—The number of men originally proposed to be voted in these estimates was 222,374, and of horses 12,925. Of this number 92,739 men and 10,181 horses were for the East Indian establishment, and 130,135 men and 12,644 horses were for service in the United Kingdom and the Colonies Supplemental estimates have since been laid before Parliament, adding the sum of £1,261,237 to the original estimates, and swelling the total estimate to the sum already mentioned of £13,299,000. One principal object of these supplemental votes is to embody the militia, and to render it available as a reserve for the regular army. These are much the latest estimates which have ever been granted for military purposes in time of peace; and if they are expended with honesty and judgment they ought to be sufficient, joined to the estimates for the navy, amounting to £12,082,800, to render us safe against any sudden attacks. Should the country be really threatened with invasion, the same spirit which armed half-a-million of volunteers in 1803 would arm twice that number now, the population having doubled itself in the interval, and the resources of the country having increased in a still greater proportion.—Liverpool Mercury.

The Dallas (Texas) Independent says that forty rangers under command of Capt. Brown, left that place on the 1st inst. for the reserve. These Rangers go in accordance with the agreement between the State Commissioners and the frontiersmen, to guard that line of the Reserve and pre-

Fugitive Slave Excitement in Chicago.

THREE FUGITIVES RETURNED TO SLAVERY —THE KIDNAPPERS ARRESTED—INTENSE EXCITMENT.

(From the Chicago Press and Tribune July 21.)

When our paper went to press on Tuesday evening we referred, in a brief article in our city column, to an excitement prevailing among our colored citizens relative to the rumored recent rendition of three fugitive slaves from the State of Missouri into the custody of their masters. It was first promulgated on Tuesday evening among the colored residents, accompanied by the exciting hint that a young colored man, named William Tanner, a resident of this city had been the tool and decoy of the captors, and the cause of their return to servitude.

Instead of pursuing to the precedent of St. Paul ex. Onesimus, and

IMMENSE EXCITEMENT AT NIAGARA.

BLONDIN'S FEAT RIVALLED.

THE ROPE BROKEN, AND THE DARING PERFORMER RECEIVES A DUCKING.

The "good old town of Niagara," although a few degrees from the centre of business and civilization, has a few spirited and enterprising citizens, who endeavour on all occasions to infuse a little life and volition into the monotonous existence consequent upon a resident in that "burgh." The rescue astonishing feat of Mons. Blondin on his rope across the chasm near the Falls has had the effect of rousing the latent energies of a few of the "b'hoys" at the mouth of the Niagara River, and a venturesome painter,—whose follies and frolics have delighted the citizens and exasperated the law officers alternately—determined on erecting a "cable" and walking across it, a la Blondin. The spot chosen was the Two Mile Creek, about a mile and a half from the town; and the article selected was the rope of an old fishing nett, kindly furnished for the occasion by some of the fishermen. The rope was stretched across the pond, and on Sunday last, after strongly fortifying his courage and nerves with large doses of "the real old stingo," videlicit, whiskey at 2s a gallon, the daring performer, taking a pike-pole for a balance-pole, put one foot on the rope, and the other soon followed. There were no guys on the "cable," the gallant painter deemed such adjuncts unnecessary, considering the "stiffeners he had imbibed. A large crowd was present, and when they beheld Mr. F. promenading over the rope, a silence deep as death took possession of them; and with bated breath, quivered lip, and moistened eye, they watched his progress, momentarily expecting a catastrophe. Nor were they disappointed; for when the performer had reached the middle of the stream, a fearful crash and a splash proclaimed a "dreadful accident." The rope broke, and the "jolly crowd" were considerably "sobred off" by their exertions to rescue their companion from the mud and water into which his sudden descent had precipitated him. The painter, however, in not disheartened by the failure of his first attempt at walking a tight-rope, as his experience in "walking a crack" has given him confidence in his powers, bibulous and locomotive, and announces that on Tuesday next the next performance will come off; but does not state whether a fishing nett will be used or not.

As this is an o'er true tale," and as the attempt will certainly be made again we would advise the town authorities to put a stop to such "tomfoolery:" for although the water in the "Two" is not very deep, an accident of a serious nature may possibly occur; and besides such scenes on the Sabbath Day are unseemly and unchristian—perhaps the Niagara "folks" don't look at it in this light.—St. Catherns Journal.

The Great Cricket Match.

ENGLAND VS. AMERICA.

All the arrangements are at length concluded in regard to the great match between All England and America. The Eleven of All England will arrive in this country the latter part of next month, and the match against the best twenty-two that the States can collect together will be played on the St. George's ground, between the 1st and 10th Sept. Part of the money has been forwarded to England to defray the expenses, which are very great. It is intended to be an international game as much as possible. This match will no doubt draw tens of thousands of persons to Hoboken from all parts of the Union, to witness the greatest game ever played in this country. The Americans (or rather the English cricketers in America) are full of confidence, and flatter themselves that they can produce twenty-two in this country who will successfully contend against the All England Eleven. We should inform our readers that the Eleven of England are the best eleven of the many cricketers in that country, and that during the cricket season, these gentlemen travel from town to town, and play against the best twenty-two that that town or club can produce, and such is their wonderful skill in the use of the bat, that it is difficult and almost impossible for any twenty-two to win the match.

We understand that although in the main fact that the Eleven of All England are coming out to play several twenty-twos' he is right, in the minor details he is wrong. The arrangements are not between England and America, but England and Canada, and to Mr. W. P. Fleering of this city, is all the credit due for the success which has marked his endeavors, and by whose exertions the necessary funds have been provided. The last number of the spirit of the Times says that there are to be altogether four matches played, as follows:—

"The first of the series of matches which are to be played on the American Continent, will be—The All England Eleven vs Twenty-two, at Montreal.

The second match will be the All England Eleven vs. Twenty-two, selected by the St. George's Club, and will be played at Hoboken on the new grounds, which are now being laid out by Mr. Stevens near the New York Yatch Club House.

The third match will be the All England Eleven vs. Twenty-two selected by the Philadelphia Clubs, and will be played at Philadelphia.

The concluding match will be the All England Eleven vs. Eleven selected by the Montreal Club and Eleven selected by the St. George's Club, to take place at Montreal."

On enquiry, we learn that if a fourth match is played, it will perhaps be played in Western Canada, the Hamilton Clubs having made overtures for that purpose.—The Montreal Club are in active practice, and hope to place in the field a Twenty-two which will put the Eleven of All England on their metal.

Religious Despair.

A young woman of the name of McDermot, who had resided with her brother on the 2nd concession of Bayham, committed suicide by drowning herself, in the river near Port Burwell, on the night of Thursday, the 14th inst. She went to bed in her usual health and spirits, but through the night got up and threw herself into the river. She was highly esteemed by those who knew her and for some time back had been labouring under a feeling of religious despair. She was heard often to say, that the devil would have her any way, and that she thought death by drowning an easy way of closing an earthly existence. No other reason can be assigned for the rash act. Her body was found on the following Saturday, a little above the Swing Bridge, near the same spot at which her father was drowned 18 years previously.—St. Thomas Journal.

REVIVAL IN THE NORTH OF IRELAND.

At the request of a number of our readers we publish the progress of the religious revival in the North of Ireland. We refrain for the present from expressing our opinion in the movement:

"News on this subject pours in upon us. Such are the moral effects of the movement that in the words of the Dublin Daily Express: "not only individuals but whole villages are transformed. The publican's occupation is gone. Instead of receiving large sums on a Saturday night he cannot sell a glass. Some do not wait for this but before they turn out their pewholders and pull down their signboards. The drunkard's song, the ribald language, the curses and blasphemy that used to be heard in certain localities have ceased. People come forward in bands and take the Temperance pledge. In one village, noted for its irreligion, only one swearer remains. Those who have become religious manifest an intense desire to save the souls of others, and induce them to live 'soberly, righteously and godly.' This desire has taken a very important turn in Coleraine. There is one class of sinners whose existence is too visible in all our towns and cities, and which is said to be increasing; yet their existence is ignored by all respectable ladies, in whose presence no allusion must be made to their condition. In Dublin there is an excellent institution which has done away with much of this false delicacy. In Coleraine one result of the revival is the formation of an association of ladies for the purpose of reclaiming and permanently providing for the 'unfortunate sisters' who have fallen from virtue, some of whom have been 'struck down.' Thus it is not a mere barren spiritualism this revival produces. It leads to useful work—just such work as Scripture calls 'the fruits of the spirit.' Viewed, then, merely as a social reform, rendering people sober, moral, upright, industrious, forgiving, kind, neighborly; scoffers should beware how they despise it. They should remember the words, 'Behold ye despisers, and wonder and perish! For I work a work in your day.'"

GREAT UNION PRAYER-MEETING AT BELFAST.

A great union prayer-meeting, in connection with the present remarkable movement, was held in the open air in Belfast, on Wednesday forenoon, at half-past 11 o'clock. In order to accommodate all parties, the use of the spacious grounds of the Royal Botanic Gardens was obtained for holding the meeting; and as it was well known that many persons from the surrounding country were desirous to be present, special trains of uncommon length were run by the different railway companies. Some idea of the interest felt in the proceedings may be imagined when we state that it is computed that no fewer than 15,000 individuals arrived in Belfast, and that from 35,000 to 40,000 persons in all were present at the services. The leading streets of the town presented during mid-day, a most remarkable aspect, particularly after the arrival of trains. The footways were literally thronged with well-dressed and respectable looking people from the country —not passing along with the negligent and easy-going air of pleasure-seeking excursionists, but staid and solemn in demeanor —the younger as well as the elder; and the majority with Bibles and hyms-books in their hands, as if proceeding to Sabbath services. On they pressed towards the place of meeting, passed the glittering rows of gorgeous shops, and through the fashionable thoroughfares. Thus the living stream—such a stream as was never before witnessed in Belfast—poured onwards for at least two hours; along both sides of the streets. The scene in the garden grounds is said by the Banner of Ulster to have been one of the most striking, as well as impressive and animating, ever witnessed in the province. The whole space within view from any point was so closely packed as it was well possible for it to be. Even the branches of the trees were taken advantage of by numbers of the junior members of the audience, as the most suitable situations for seeing and hearing; and there while the sounds of praise were rising from the multitude below, these young worshippers were heard joining in the song of thanksgiving. Nothing of holiday levity —nothing of the thoughtless mirth of youth —was manifest among these; their attention to the proceedings was as marked, and their conduct as well ordered, as that of any persons in the vast assemblage. Both as regarded its magnitude and the deep solemn and earnest spirit that pervaded it, the Meeting is said to have recalled vividly the historical days and scenes of the signing of the "Solemn League and Covenant." The Rev. John Johnson, of Tullilish, Moderator of the General Assembly of the Irish Presbyterian Church presided, and was supported by the ministers of the different Protestant denominations in and around Belfast. After prayer, the Chairman read a chapter from the Holy Scripture and then gave out the 100th Psalm; and never before in Belfast did so many voices unite in the hearty accord in singing this favorite song of Zion. Scarcely had the first note been raised on the platform when it was caught up by the immense assemblage the majority of the voices combining in surprising and unexpected harmony; and, as each stanza closed, the dying wave of the cadence in the far distance of the throng had an effect at once solemn and thrilling.—Short addresses were delivered by ministers and converts; and also by Mr. William Dickson, of Edinburgh, and Mr. Peter Drummond, of Stirling. Prayers were also offered up, and verses from hymns sung.—As it was impossible for the speakers on the central platform to make themselves heard by the whole of the vast multitude, clergymen and others scattered themselves among them, each forming the centre of a large congregation which immediately gathered around, joining in devotional exercises. At one time there were no less than twenty of these subordinate Meetings, numbering from 500 to 1,000 each. Every here and there throughout the immense multitude, while the hymn or the prayer was rising on high, persons being struck down under a sense of deep and overpowering conviction of sin. Inside of some of these circles there could not have been fewer than twenty persons—chiefly females—apparently under influence of spiritual visitation, at the same moment; some of them prostrate upon the ground, and others reclining upon the laps of friends. These were elected in various ways—some weeping bitterly, but silently, under a deep conviction of sin; some crying piteously for mercy; and others unable to utter a word or audibly, save their physical faculties in abeyance. In many parts of the garden, groups of boys and girls, who had retired from the body of the congregation, formed in the shadowy little Meetings for prayer and exhortation among themselves. Some of these were ragged little boys who had evidently belonged to the street Arabs. One of them came near the end of a little lake, about eleven years old, who, in a very retired part of the garden, engaged in prayer, surrounded by about twenty lads of the same age and class. This fact was, it appears, neglected by his parents and formerly obtained a scanty livelihood by hawking bellads through the streets; and the tattered garments in which he as well as his companions were arrayed on Wednesday showed that, in that respect their prospects in life have not much improved. At the close of the General Meeting, one of the ministers of the town, who has moved a great deal among the juvenile population, was surrounded by a large assemblage of boys, who ultimately formed themselves into a procession, and marched into town, singing, "Oh, that will be joyful." Many of these children evidently belonged to the lowest classes of society. A portion of the procession, which divided from the rest, arriving at the Pound district, ceased to sing till they had passed its dangerous precincts, and resumed their song when they passed into Townsend street The immense concourse of people left the garden in the most orderly manner—the majority of them evidently impressed with the conviction that it was "good for them to have been there." A few manufactories and other places of business were closed for the day in order to allow the workmen to join in the above services.

Louis Napoleon and Great Britain.

[From Bell's Weekly Messenger.]

Whatever may be the future purpose of Louis Napoleon with reference to Great Britain—whether he intends sooner or later to attempt the invasion of our shores, or to try the strength of France against that of our own Navy upon the high seas—he clearly feels that he has enough upon his hands for the present and can well let alone any other troublesome matter until time or circumstances may induce him to consider that a war with England is a necessity. The frightful slaughter which his army has suffered in Italy; the very little amount of triumph he has yet to show for the losses his troops have sustained, which amount nearly to decimation; and the tedious work that is before them of reducing the four great quadrilateral fortresses, by which Austria checks his progress towards her own proper soil; should the armistice, which is just announced, be only temporary all tell him that it is policy to keep on good terms with every Foreign Power, with whom he is not at war, and to endeavor to assure them that his object is single, merely to effect the liberation of Italy?

So far as we are ourselves, as journalists concerned, our readers know that we have never put very strong faith in any of Louis Napoleon's assurances. We have marked his line of conduct from the moment of his escape from Ham to the present hour; we have witnessed the fulfilment of every ambitious purpose thus far, on which his heart is set; we know that he publicly and positively assured his judges that his destiny was to avenge Waterloo," when making excuse at his trial for having unsuccessfully attempted to upset the throne of Louis Philippe. Every action of his career has indicated one set purpose. Nothing has stood in the way of his ambition. Like his uncle, he is a fatalist, and destiny is his guiding star. If, therefore he was sincere —of which there is little doubt—when he said his mission involved "the avenging of Waterloo," whenever the star, to which he looks points towards the shores of Great Britain, he will arrive to follow its direction. That is as certain as that he is now warring upon some false premises—as a despot seeking to emancipate the subjects of another despot, between whose conduct towards their own people there is not a pin to choose. However, the star of destiny does not shine very brightly in the vicinity of our own island at the present moment, and therefore, it costs Louis Napoleon very little to make professions, and to give assurances of honor and uprightness. Nevertheless, we take these assurances, whenever they are made, with a certain amount of reservation, believing that the course of prudence on our part is to take them for just what they are worth, and to "keep watch" as our inimitable and witty contemporary, Punch, this week, suggests, in order that a march may not be stolen upon us, that some morning we shall hear of a descent upon our shores being commanded.

The liberties of Italy is unquestionably the ardent desire of the majority of our countrymen; yet we question very much whether any aspirations on our part would lead us to take part with Louis Napoleon in the present, or any future, proceedings. We cannot believe in the good intentions of a despot. He must prove to Europe, no less than to Italy, that he means to give the Italians a Constitutional Government, liberty of conscience, freedom from political oppression. With his antecedents, can such results be expected from the present war. When cucumbers are extracted from the sun's beams, and stones show that they possess a heart, we may believe that they will do so, but not till then! Lord Palmerston, therefore, must exercise caution in his proceedings; for we tell him plainly, though Great Britain is not Austrian, and has to desire that Italy should remain the downtrodden, enslaved, and degraded land, it has so long been under priestly domination and imperial tyranny, our countrymen cannot look with any complacency upon a Russo-French alliance, nor regard with affection any disposition to aid and abet Louis Napoleon in any one of his ambitious projects.

Amusements Denounced.

The Roman Catholic Bishop of Montreal has addressed a circular to his clergy, calling upon them, as soon as possible, to pronounce from their pulpits "a strong warning against the Opera, the Theatre, Circus, and other amusements of a similar nature, which at the present moment are a real scandal to our City and country districts. His lordship also implores them to take up in their respective parishes a collection for "the Missions of Oregon, Nanqualli and Vancouver; for very soon a pious expedition, composed of Missionary Priests, and of Religious of both sexes, will start for Oregon City, accompanied by the Archbishop of that city. Our religion expects that this Diocese shall again approve itself worthy of its high Mission. It is desired also that the amount of the several collections be transmitted as quickly as possible to the Bishopric of Montreal."

Reforms in Mexico.

Mexico has all the natural advantages which could be asked on which to base the prosperity of a free and happy people. But heretofore the instability of its political condition, and the overwhelming power and influence of a proud, rapacious and ignorant priesthood, have checked the progress of the country, deterred settlers from entering it, and covered its future with lowering clouds. A happier day, however, has dawned. The liberal party is firmly seated in power, and one of its first movements has been the confiscation of the immense estate of the Church, with the view of breaking down its mischevious and vast temporal authority. Absolute religious liberty has been proclaimed, and, among others, the following reforms in the ecclesiastical system are to be effected. We copy from the official programme:

In the first place for the purpose of putting a definite end to that sanguinary fratricidal war which one portion of the clergy has been fomenting for some time past, for the sake solely of conserving the interests and prerogatives which they inherited from the colonial system, by the scandalous abuse of the influence given by the wealth which they own, and by the exercise of their sacred ministry, the government believes it indispensable to disarm at once this class of the elements which serve to support this gloomy rule.

First. By adopting, as an invariable general rule the most perfect independence between matters of State and those which are purely ecclesiastical.

Second. By suppressing all ecclesiastical corporations of the masculine sex, without any exception, and secularizing the priests that are now in them.

Third. By extinguishing also the confraternities, arch-confraternities, brotherhoods, and generally all corporations or congregations of that nature which exist.

Fourth. By confining novices in nunneries, keeping in them those that are at present there, with the capitals or quotations which each may have introduced, and with the assignment of that which is requisite for the service of worship in their respective churches.

Fifth. By declaring that all the property which is now administered by the secular and regular clergy, under various titles, as well as the excess possessed by nunneries, after deducting the amount of their donations, has been and is the property of the nation, and that said property is attented, the bonds for the public debt and for the capitalization of salaries being receivable in payment of a portion of its value.

Sixth. By declaring, finally, that the remuneration given by the faithful to the priests, as well for the administration of the sacraments as for all other ecclesiastical services, and the annual product of which, properly distributed, is amply sufficient for the maintenance of public worship and of its ministers, is a matter of voluntary agreement between the faithful and the priests, in which the civil authority shall not interfere.

Great Loss of Life at Sea.

[From Northern [Liverpool] Times, July 13,

A letter from Alexandria of the 30th says:—A frightful catastrophe has thrown the European inhabitants of this city into consternation. The steamer Sulistria, of the Ottoman Company, which left Alexandria for Constantinople on the 25th, with about 350 Turkish and Christian passengers on board, foundered at sea, in consequence of a leak which she sprung in a few hours after she left the port. Only 273 of the persons on board were saved by a small Egyptian transport, the remaining seventy-seven perished. The captain and Turkish crew are said to have acted with the greatest barbarity, preventing by violence and murder the unfortunate Christians from availing themselves of the assistance thus providentially sent to them. During the few hours previous to the vessel going down scenes of carnage took place on deck between the crew, under the orders of the captain, and the Europeans on board. A Venetian had his head laid open by a cut from a hatchet, and others were killed in the struggle. The Christians, in addition to losing all their property on board, were robbed of all the money and jewellery they had about them. The captain and crew of the steamer, on being brought back to Alexandria, were put into confinement to await the investigation into the affair. We consider it our duty to mention the noble conduct of twenty-eight Austrian sailors, who were passengers on board, and through whose assistance a number of lives were saved which would otherwise have been lost.

The Course of War.

The Boston Journal gives the following concise abstract, in chronological order, of the events of the war of 1859.

The Emperor Louis Napoleon publicly expresses to the Austrian Envoy at his court his regret that the two governments are not on better terms—which creates extraordinary sensation and leads to mutual armaments—January 1, 1859.

Events growing daily more threatening, it is announced that England has sent Lord Cowley on a peace mission to Vienna, February 22.

The announcement made that a Peace Congress will be held, the effect of which is to open long negotiations about the preliminary question of disarmament, March 19.

And all hopes of peace are quenched by the news that Austria has insisted upon the disarmament of Sardinia alone, as a condition precedent to any peace negotiations, April 8.

Austrian and Sardinian forces having assembled in the neighborhood of the Ticino, Count Gyulai dispatches a peremptory summons to the King of Sardinia to disarm within three days on penalty of war April 12.

Victor Emmanuel, having refused in indignant refusal, is invested with dictatorial powers, April 23.

Lord Malmesbury issues a final proposition for negotiation—which is accepted by Austria, and rejected by France, April 25.

French troops begin to land at Genoa, April 26.

Tuscany throws off its government, and declares for Victor Emmanuel, April 29.

The Austrian army in three divisions crosses the Ticino, April 29.

A detachment of Austrians, in attempting to cross the Po at Frassinetto, is repulsed by the Sardinians, May 2.

Louis Napoleon issues decrees relating to his departure for the army, May 3.

Louis Napoleon leaves Paris May 10, reaches Genoa on the 12th, and joins the army on the 14th.

The battle of Montebello is fought between the corps of the two armies, the French under General Forey overwhelming the Austrians in overwhelming numbers, May 20.

Garibaldi fights his way into the city of Como, where he is joyfully received by the citizens, May 27.

The battle of Palestro is fought by about 12,000 Sardinians under the King, and 20,000 Austrians under Gen. Zobel—the latter withdrawing, May 30.

The battle of Magenta is fought, in which 100,000 allies under Gen. McMahon rout 120,000 Austrians under General Gyulai, June 4.

The Emperor Napoleon and King Victor Emmanuel enter Milan, followed by the citizens, June 8.

The battle of Malegnano is fought, the Austrians under Benedick being driven from their position by the allies under d'Mallieri, June 9.

The battle of Solferino is fought, under the command of the two Emperors, by nearly 400,000 troops, the Austrians being compelled to retire, June 24.

The Sardinians begin to invest the fortress of Peschiera, June 26.

The allies cross the Mincio, June 30.

The French Emperor takes up his headquarters at Valleggio, on the east bank of the Mincio, July 3.

The armistice between the belligerents, to last till August 15, is signed, July 8.

Peace between the two Emperors agreed upon, July 11.

The System and the Men.

The momentous intelligence which we publish to-day has rather increased than diminished the importance of the solemn warning addressed by Lord Lyndhurst to the country from his place in Parliament on Tuesday last. But, important as they even now are, the tardy warning of the Nestor of the House of Lords are remarkable for a conspicuous omission. He has stopped one stage too early, for although he has shown us the necessity of a constant defensive force, and the propriety of keeping up an efficient Army and a good steam Navy, he has failed to impress upon us the conditions upon which alone either a navy can be victorious against an enemy. Give us Navies and give us Armies,—we are willing to pay for them, as an efficient guard, and not as a costly plaything. We want them in full working efficiency, and in that day they may be in constant exercise. We have strained our finances, and every one of us will be called upon to retrench some little comfort or luxury in order that we may have a Channel fleet. That Channel fleet ought to be in the Channel. It ought to pass at short intervals from hand to hand, in order that every naval officer who is in a position to be called upon to command may be tried in his efficiency, and may have experience of his duties. Yet, instead of this, if we are rightly informed, this costly armament has during all this year, except one short trip to Gibralter and the cruise whereof our Naval Intelligence of this morning announces the commencement, moved only from Bantry Bay to Portland Roads. Nothing demoralizes a sailor like a harbor, and nothing smartens him like blue water. This fleet should be commanded by comparatively young men, emulous of each other's smartness. It should be always afloat, not always wanting coals, but never sparing canvas. As it is, if a sudden call should occur some of these ships might almost realize Mr. Cobden's old story, and run aground on their beef bones. This is what all England is agitating for and paying for. We must make Generals and Admirals, and allow them an opportunity to obtain the confidence of their countrymen, or we should soon grow tired of paying for defences which we cannot trust. At present the public mind is to be impressed with a fear that a war would but too surely call forth some English Gyulai, or some English Haus, to suffer defeats upon the soundest naval and military principles. Aldershott, the Curragh, and Shorncliffe were formed to teach officers to handle armies, as well as to teach raw recruits the goose step. They were created for the purpose of giving us some reasonable prospect that in future campaigns we should not awake to the knowledge that a Cardigan had destroyed the English Cavalry by a rapid progress, and that a Lucan had attained a similar end by a slower method; or that we should have to compensate ourselves by listening to their mutual recriminations as the cause of the catastrophe, and to draw comfort from a contemplation of the honour and promotion with which their services were recompensed. Lord Lyndhurst must amend his counsel, and while he sings of arms he must also tell us how to obtain the man.

When Dr. Dodge, an eclectic physician, was lecturing through this State on the laws of health, and particularly on the effects of tea and coffee, he happened to meet one morning, at the breakfast table, a witty son of Erin, of the better class. Conversation turned on the doctor's favorite subject; he addressed our Irish friend, as follows:

"Perhaps you think that I would be unable to convince you of the deleterious effects of tea and coffee?"

"I don't know," said Erin, "but I'd like to be there when you do it!"

"Well," said the doctor, "if I convince you that they are injurous to your health, will you abstain from their use?"

"Sure, and I will, sir."

"How often do you use coffee and tea?" asked the doctor.

"Morning and night, sir."

"Well," said the doctor, "do you ever experience a slight dizziness of the brain on going to bed?"

"I do; indeed I do," replied Erin.

"And a sharp pain through the temples, in and about the eyes, in the morning?"

"Troth I do, sir."

"Well said the doctor with an air of confidence and assurance in his manner, "that is the tea and coffee."

"It is indeed? Faith, and I always thought it was the whiskey I drank."

The company roared with laughter, and doctor quietly retired. He was beaten.

Romance in Real Life.

A MAN'S NEW BROKEN BYE.

From the San Francisco Bulletin of the 17th ult., we take the following account of one of the most noted street corner brokers of San Francisco. By all familiar with that place it will be recognized as a "true bill" of the individual alluded to.—He often made it a boast to intimate friends, that he carried his most important paper negotiations on his person, to avoid the inquisitions of sheriff's officers, it being his idea that himself and his drawing room were exempt from personal search by them. The themselves runs thus:—

A grand affair took place Sunday about noon, which was no less than an entry by Signor Dagu[illegible]-rotipe into the "family" of A. J. Ellis, the great street photographer with the [illegible] Mr. Ellis had gone down to the citizens of New Orleans as well as the city of Washington. He had left at the helm of affairs in the former city, where he found accommodations and room to [illegible] Cuticura, which are said to [illegible] costs of the operation, which are said to have been very large. He arrived in this city some five or six years ago, and went to the street brokerage business, buying stocks and lending money on watches, jewelry, and any other safe collaterals. He appears to have worn but one suit of clothes from the day of his arrival here until the present, and was never known to indulge in expense, except one or two occasions. He once bestowed John Cook, into manner to throw coin into the bay, and for every dollar Cook threw, King threw five—and was the last. He deposited of $60 on this occasion; but afterwards boasted that the incident was worth thousands to him in the way of advertisement. At the time of the Atlantic Telegraph Cable celebration, King paid $75 to the hire of a barouche and four splendid white horses, with which he "splurged" at the head of the procession—another advertisement.

With these and a few other exceptions, Old King, or Greasy King, as he is familiarly called, was, and is perhaps, the tightest fisted, incorrigible old miser in the State of California. No feeling exists in his breast, except that of a love of gain. He knew no friends, felt for no one and nothing except gold, gold, and again gold. He seems to have no relatives in this country, and has treated those left in the East with rudeness, bearing on the street that, in answer to an application of a little niece for a token of remembrance, he sent his toenails, which he had purposely allowed to grow very long.

At the time of King's residence in New Orleans, 1840, '50 and '51, he was the proprietor of a large retail dry goods and indies, fancy store, called "King's Marble Palace." He was an extensive advertiser in the papers, and hired numbers of boys to carry large placard in procession through the streets, and leased broadsides of houses to paint his notice upon. He must have done an immense business in the line; but in '53 he suddenly "failed," and left unexpectedly for California, leaving large creditors to whistle for their money and curse their own stupidity in trusting him. Among other debts, he left a large number of notes, which he has, by various shifts, avoided paying, but many of them have been sent out here for collection. As it was, however, supposed that nothing could be made out of the man, none were ever prosecuted to judgment except one, in which judgment was rendered in one of our courts some months ago, and it was the execution in this case that was levied by the Deputy Sheriff to-day.

King occupied a room in the third story of Bolton and Barron's building, in Merchant street, which he deemed fire-proof, thief-proof, and execution proof. But he was mistaken as to the execution part of the proof, as the event showed, for having to-day, unwarily left his door open, the officer watched his opportunity, suddenly rushed in. As he did so, King seized a pistol, and presented at the officer; but fearful of his own temerity, immediately cried out, "It's not loaded; it's not loaded." He then tried to stuff watches and jewellery, which were lying promiscuously around, in his pockets, but was prevented by the officer, and in despair he rushed down stairs for such legal advice as would not cost anything. He asked the District Attorney, whom he happened to meet, whether a man could enter his "castle" with an execution, and being told that certainly he could, the disconsolate man returned to his room and offered the officer five dollars to leave and say nothing about the matter.

Upon looking around, there were actually found, lying about $20,000 in bags of gold coin, watches, diamonds, stocks and other property. These were discovered in the bed, stuffed between the mattrass and the pillow. But besides this, there is an iron closet in the room, and from the revelations made, it is supposed that King is really worth about $300,000. Poor man!

Agriculture in Lower Canada.

From the Quebec Mercury.

One of the saddest considerations in respect of Lower Canada as a producing country, is the fact that it can no longer raise sufficient grain for its own consumption. In this condition, it has probably been for perhaps a quarter of a century, and we are now interested chiefly to Upper Canada for the deficiency. This is sufficiently humiliating to Lower Canada, starting in its agriculture career some two centuries before the sister Province. Some forty or fifty years ago, our habitants with their granaries groaning under the weight of grain, freely brought it into our cities for sale or deposit with our merchants.—Those were golden times with both. Now all is changed. The grain brought in is trifling; and the merchant formerly looking to the farmer as his best customer, now seeks other channels of traffic. Lord Durham, in his famous Report, spoke of the causes of this deficiency as due to non acquaintance with the proper rotation of crops on the part of our farmers, want of drainage, and manuring. Since he wrote our crops have been devasted by insects, and there has been no improvement but on the contrary, retrogression; we are worse off than we were 20 years ago, and will be still worse 20 years hence if some means are not devised to meet the causes of this growing evil. Works on agriculture and journals for the benefit of the farmer have been long published, but apparently these causes for the most part still lie hid. Our agricultural Societies so far have chiefly directed their attention to live stock and to rarity of vegetable production, rather than to noting the agricultural situation of Lower Canada is lamentable. This country, with a climate and capabilities like those of the Baltic should be an enormous producer and exporter of grain. It is singularly blessed for production—in its situation and its climate—though this last is severe, but so is that of the Baltic grain countries.—Travellers in former times have been struck with its great agricultural capabilities.—Some portions of it were never surpassed for teeming fertility of soil; we would refer in particular to the valley of the Richelieu and other districts, just now so remarkable for short or stunted crops. The country has been drained of its agricultural riches; the laws of agriculture set at naught. The goose has been killed for the sake of the golden egg. This is a matter that should engage the serious attention of our public men. What will be railroads to Lower Canada, if it is to remain agricultural? year by year? Before they were established, the cry was that produce could not be brought to the city. Now that they are laid, there is apparently little to bring. Agricultural capital should be the rule in Lower Canada; it should be the pre-eminent characteristic.

Progress of Ireland.

Dublin, Monday Morning.—Favorable reports from here and Belfast as to the harvest and as had therefore no effect upon the funds. There have been some showers of rain in the south of Ireland, but not to any extent to do injury to the crops. The weather in the country, that should have been very fine, has been very unfavorable. Still, however, the crops have suffered to about the extent from the want of rain, and the hay crop especially will be a short one. Some pieces of hay on the Phœnix Park belonging to the Earl of Kellmore, which was very late and on one in the grass, has been sold at a very high price, equivalent to £6 an acre. Where the hay crop is anything like an average production, it sells for £12 an acre. In various districts oats are very short and poor, and a portion of the potatoes are stunted in growth from the want of moisture, but I have no complaints about the quality of any of the crops except oats; and as the markets continue high, with abundant supplies, we may infer that there is no real cause for apprehension about the harvest now approaching. The country is generally prosperous, and the people are not easily frightened.

THE BRITISH CORN TRADE.

Another week's brilliant weather has forced on the crops rapidly. Oats and Talavera wheat are already cut, but the extreme heat has brought on premature ripeness. There is much blind wheat and thin barley in consequence; while the large quantity laid by the storms has been more or less damaged, and must make a considerable bulk of inferior quality. Potatoes show the disease also, with an intensity equal in some localities to the most calamitous years; and the injury appears to have extended partially to France, Belgium and Holland. But the unexpected armistice, followed by a sudden peace between Austria and France, in the midst of good foreign supplies and fine weather, has again lowered wheat prices 3s to 4s. The London market leads the panic, till growers themselves have become bigots, in the confidence of some reaction in prices. In another week the harvest will be general, and then a better estimate of the crops can be formed; but at present neither the yield nor quality seem likely to exceed an ordinary average. —Mark-lane Express.

TORONTO MARKETS.

Wednesday, August 3, 1859.

Yesterday there was absolutely nothing offering on the market. No wheat changed hands and we have to continue the quotations of Saturday, when 5s per bushel was paid. We have, of course, no change to note in other grains. Oats are perhaps scarce and firm at 2s 7d a 2s 9d per bushel.

Root Crops Recommended.—In a recent issue of the Maine Farmer, the editor speaks highly of the value of roots, ruta bagas, mangels, &c., for feeding cattle, especially in winter. He says:—"We have been [illegible] but the ultimate value of them, for the last time [illegible] off very much. People [illegible] the comparative value of them [illegible]. We all know that Canadian [illegible] in the nutritive power of the articles which we can, especially for our own use the kind of our domestic animals; and [illegible] think that we, as well as our animals, are so constituted as to require this great variety for the conformance of health and activity. Keep yourself on one concentrated food, and you may perhaps grow fat, but you will also become sick, or languid and spiritless. Sailors know this.—Where they get into situations where they are confined to live on one kind of food, they find, their health decline and their strength and vital powers to fag, and they finally have to 'give up the ship.' It is, therefore, a duty to cultivate a variety of articles to be used as fodder for our stock, during our long winters. Good hay is the staple crop for this purpose. It is to cattle what bread is to their owner, the staff of their lives. But roots of different kinds yield an agreeable and profitable variety.—In olden times, when the potato rot was unknown, the potato, being the easiest raised and preserved, was much used for cattle food. The potato rot put a veto on this root as stock food."

Value of Vetches.—A. Woollard of Canada West, bears the following testimony to the value of vetches, one of the most profitable forage crops in use in England:—"Two years ago I imported a quantity for trial, and I have pleasure in stating that the experiment has been far beyond my most sanguine expectations.—I have tried it on all kinds of land, and it has done well on each, but I consider high land the best. I have sown it upon a piece of fruitful land, where there were not over four inches of soil, and the crop was abundant. I have mowed it three times in one season (upon common clay land) for my horses. I have also cut it once for feed, and left the second growth for seed, which returned twenty bushels per acre. I should also inform you that my cattle have been fed upon vetch straw this winter, and I consider it much superior as fodder, to any other kind of straw."

PHONOGRAPHY, OR WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of letters are daily written by it, and therefore letters constantly pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six; So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it shortly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 150 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

"THE CANADIAN PHONETIC PIONEER"
Is a Monthly Journal, devoted to the advocacy of the Reform. Price 25 cents per annum.

Manufacturers, Mechanics and Inventors.

The Scientific American
TO BE ENLARGED!
A NEW VOLUME—NEW SERIES,
TO COMMENCE ON JULY 2d, 1859.

Instead of 416 pages, the yearly volume, Enlarged Series, will contain eight hundred and thirty-two pages of valuable reading matter, useful and instructive to all classes.

THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN is published weekly in quarto form, suitable for binding, and the numbers for a single year contains information in regard to new inventions, Machinery, all branches of Manufacturing processes, Agricultural Implements, Engineering, Millwrighting, Iron Manufacture, chemistry; in fact, almost every industrial pursuit receives more or less attention in its columns.

All Patent claims officially published every week, as reported from the Patent Office; and for

INVENTORS AND PATENTEES

It contains information not to be obtained elsewhere, and which no mechanic, inventor or patentee can well do without.

As a Family Journal it has no superior for real practical utility, since in its columns will be found useful practical receipes.

Careful attention will be given, from time to time to reports of the Metal, Lumber and other Markets.

Every number will contain sixteen pages and forty-eight columns of matter, with several illustrations of patented machines and other engravings, comprising in a single year about

SIX HUNDRED ORIGINAL ENGRAVINGS.

With the Enlarged Series is presented an opportunity to subscribe not likely to occur again for many years. It will be like commencing a new work—Vol. I, No. 1, new Series

Send in your subscriptions without delay, as to begin the new volume—July 2nd.

Terms $2 a Year—$1 for Six Months.

Southern, Western and Canadian money or Post Office stamps taken at par for subscriptions. Canadian subscribers will please to remit twenty-six cents extra on each year's subscription, to pre-pay postage.

A liberal discount to clubs. A prospectus giving full particulars of the inducements for clubs, with specimen copies of the paper, and a pamphlet of information concerning the procuring of Patents may be had gratis, by addressing

MISCELLANEOUS.

$100 A YEAR,

AND upwards saved to the Farmer, by ALBUS MOWRY'S
CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient, with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 15 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by case-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

☞ Price $15 00 ☜

All orders directed to "M. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.

The inventor, Alden Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.

Address, "Alden Mowry, Peterboro', C. W."

N. B.—Any persons infringing upon this Patent, will be prosecuted to the utmost extent the law will allow. Patent dated March 16th, 1859.

THE DOMESTIC ELEMENT.

CHAPTER I.

"Julia has been to the public schools long enough," said Mrs. Mason to her husband. "She is fifteen years old, and I am sure she can learn nothing more till she is sent to a boarding school."

"Nonsense!"

"Besides, Mrs. Benson's daughter has left, and Julia don't want to go any longer."

"Let her stay at home then."

"Stay at home! Don't you mean she shall have any polish?"

"Can't you polish her, my dear?" asked the easy husband, with a good-natured smile.

"How absurdly you talk!"

"Why, my dear, you have got quite polish enough for the wife of a small merchant. I would not give a copper to have you any more of a lady than you are."

"But Julia may be the wife of a rich man; what would she be then without music French and painting?"

"And she may be the wife of a poor mechanic, and these accomplishments be useless and burdensome."

"She never shall be the wife of a mechanic, if I can help it," rettored Mrs. Mason, smartly.

"Fie, Mary; you are unreasonable.—Why should she look higher than a mechanic, especially as some of our best and most reputable men are mechanics?"

"She shall not be wife of a mechanic if I can help it," repeated the lady.

"Why not?"

"She shall do better, and that is the reason why I want her better educated."

"She may do worse. What are we, my dear, that we need look among the sabobs for a husband for our daughter?"

"Are you not a merchant?"

"Only a small shopkeeper."

"Well, that's a merchant; and I mean Julia shall marry a merchant."

Mr. Mason yielded the point, and agreed that Julia should marry whomsoever she and her mother might choose.

"But she must be educated for her future station."

"True, she must."

"She must go to a boarding school, and learn French, music, painting, and German."

"And Chinese," interposed Mr. Mason.

"She must learn all the fashionable things."

"I believe English grammar, writing and arithmetic are not in fashion."

"Pooh! she knows all about these things."

"I asked her to tell me how many bushels of potatoes a wagon seven feet long by four wide and three high would contain, and she could not make the first figure towards it."

"I suppose there was no such question in her book."

"Perhaps not; and she could not tell me where Sevastopol was—whether it was in China or the Sandwich Islands."

"How foolish you are! I think likely she ever happened to see the place on the map."

"And that letter which she wrote to her uncle was such horrible grammar I was ashamed to send it."

"No matter for that; she understands grammar very well."

"May be she does; but she has an awkward way of showing it. I suppose washing, cooking, and baking are not fashionable either."

"There it is again."

"I think you would do better by her if you took her into the kitchen, and taught her these things. If she happens to marry a poor man they will be of some service to her."

"Time enough for these things."

"Well, well, do as you please; but I am opposed to boarding schools; I think they do more harm than good."

"That's just like you! Opposed to boarding schools! Who ever heard of such a thing?"

"They spoil more young ladies than they ever benefit."

"How in the world can it spoil them?"

"Home is the place for girls. The first thing they should be taught to love is the fireside; they ought never to be weaned from it by sending them away to undergo monastic discipline in a boarding school."

"How foolish!"

"It gives them bad habits—makes them romantic—fills their silly head with moonshine; and if you send Julia, ten to one she will run away with some boarded puppy."

But it was no kind of use for Mr. Mason to argue with his wife on such a topic as this; she was bent on sending Julia to the boarding school. He was a man of peace, and, rather than make a tempest, he withdrew from the combat.

CHAPTER II.

Julia Mason did not possess a very brilliant intellect. Nature had never intended her for a "blue stocking," and, live as long as she might, there was no probability that she would ever become even a "strong-minded woman. She had for many years attended one of the public schools, but had never risen above the second class, and the master did not believe she ever would.

Yet, for all this, Julia was a good-hearted, generous wholecoated girl. What nature had neglected to place in her head, she had beneficently put in her heart. She had a nice, womanly, domestic temperament, was quiet and unobtrusive in her manners, and, without doubt, if no pains had been taken to spoil her, would have made somebody a very loving if not a very brilliant wife.

She was a little disposed to be romantic and sentimental—would have fed and thriven on novelettes—a temperament which requires a great deal of prudent management on the part of the parent or guardian.

Julia went to the boarding school; but she had not been there three weeks before she wrote to her mother, begging her to take her away, for the duliness the school absolutely dist—

The poor girl was homesick. Midnight discipline was no outrage upon her affectionate, domestic nature. She had been accustomed to spend her evenings by the fireside at home, with her parents and younger brother and sisters; and it was a sad deprivation to her to be driven, at the stroke of a bell, into her chamber at seven o'clock, there to sit in painful silence with her roommate, and study her lessons. She was not a genius, and she hated study; it was uncongenial in the highest degree.

At nine o'clock, at the stroke of the bell she must retire, and in fifteen minutes her light must be put, or a black mark was made against her name on the following day; so it was all day long, week in and week out. Her existence was odiously mechanical. Her life was regulated by that everlasting stroke of the bell. She was obliged to do everything by rule—eat, drink, sleep, study, play, walk, by rule.

It was unnatural, and her soul cried out within her against such monstrous formality. She could not learn, her heart grieved so under the repulsive mechanism of her existence. Even the music lessons, which she had anticipated with the liviest pleasure, was gloomy and distasteful. She was conscientious, and, though her companions laughed at her for it, she at first paid the most implicit obedience to the rules of the institution. Her roommate devised various happy expedients for relieving the tedium of their lives; but she refused to avail herself of them.

Her mother begged her to persevere for a time, assuring her that she was only homesick—a disease which a few weeks would effectually cure. She did persevere; but her "chum" finally succeded in overcoming her conscientious scruples, and the evenings, instead of being passed in study, were devoted to a "good time generally." It is true, Julia got innumerable black marks for failures in her recitations; but the horrible bugbears soon became so familiar that they ceased to have any terrors. Before the first term had expired, she had so completely weaned herself from her domestic memories that home had lost all its charms.

She had learned a great many "new tricks." Indeed, the preceptor, in his report to her parents at the close of her first term, felt it his duty to say that her conduct had not been altogether satisfactory. She had gone to the boarding school the quietest person in the world; she returned a romp, her head full of strange notions about lovers and her heart as washy as the moonshine in her head.

On the first evening after her return home she insisted on going to the opera; the second to a concert; the third to the theatre; the fourth to a lecture; the fifth to a party; the sixth to a conference meeting; and so on every evening.

"What in the world has got into you, Julia? You did not use to be fond of 'kiting' round in this manner," said the astonished Mrs. Mason.

"O mother, it is so insufferably dull at home! Besides, it is not fashionable to stay at home in the evening," drawled Julia.

"What has got into you?"

"Boarding schools," said Mr. Mason.

"I should die of ennui to stay at home an evening," continued the daughter, with a languishing sigh.

"You had better give her a lesson on the pots and kettles now," interrupted Mr. Mason.

"O papa, how cruel you are! Pray go to the opera with me."

Mr. Mason was an indulgent papa, and he was obliged to go; but he could not help wondering what Julia would finally come to if she was permitted to go on in this manner.

CHAPTER III.

Julia returned to the boarding school, and in spite of the weak efforts of her father to avert the fashionable fate that awaited her, she continued there for nearly two years. In music and painting she made a rapid progress; but in literature and science she failed to make even a decent proficiency.

She was an altered creature. She was vain, affected, romantic, and transcendental cherishing all sorts of visionary notions about life, and especially about lovers and husbands, who filled a long space in her daily meditations. She had lost her domestic nature, and that was the saddest loss of all. Her heart was not actually corrupted; but it was so buried up in the weeds of vanity and folly that its gentle influence was almost entirely lost upon her life and character. If not smeared, she had lost that bold upon woman's sphere which confers her chief charm in society. She was a creature for the ball room and the opera, and not for the quiet shades of home.

Perhaps a boarding school does not always make such sad havoc in the mind and heart of a young female; but such is the tendency of its artificial manner of existence. Monastic discipline spoils woman; it removes her from, and unfits her for, her social domestic position.

When two years had nearly expired, Mr. Mason one day received a letter from the principal of the seminary, containing the astounding intelligence that Julia had eloped with a young gentleman who had come from the city on a visit in the neighbourhood.

"The grand finale of the drama," said Mr. Mason throwing the letter to his wife.

"Good Heavens! who is this Mr. Winchel?" exclaimed Mrs. Mason, when she had read the letter.

"A son of Winchel, the merchant in —— Street."

"Rich?"

"Yes."

"Thank God it is no worse!" replied Mrs. Mason, as far relieved that a pleasant smile played upon her lips.

A few days after, Julia and her husband presented themselves at the home of her father. They were received with open arms. Mrs. Mason was too much pleased with the match to make a fuss about it, and Mr. —— fatigued his spirits "a load."

A few weeks after, they were gratified by receiving a pleasant letter from Mr. Winchel, who had imparted a liberal portion of his substance for the good boys of a branch of his estate, induced upon going to housekeeping instead of boarding.

This kind of life was novel to Julia, and for the first six months, while her husband consented to take her every evening to the opera, a ball, party, or concert, she was tolerably contented.

But Mr. Winchel got sick of such an incessant round of amusement, and sighed for that paradise of home which his imagination had years ago painted. He reasoned with his giddy wife; but she hated home, and reproached him for attempting to imprison her in the house, and thus make her life miserable.

Mr. Winchel was firm and positively refused to go to any more operas, balls, parties, or concerts.

Julia was forced to accede to his reasonable desires; but home, even in the presence of her husband, had become an intolerable place. Indeed, the romance of a husband had worn itself away. He had fallen in love with her in the most natural way in the world, and had proposed to wait upon her father, and arrange the preliminaries for their marriage; but Julia was not content to be united to him in such a tame manner as that, and insisted upon an elopement. Her lover gratified her—to his sorrow he now discovered.

Julia was unhappy. Her husband, disgusted at her folly, returned to the club he had abandoned when he married her, leaving her to comfort or amuse herself as best she might. And she found comfort and amusement in the society of a gay and dashing Lothario, who consoled her for her husband's absence by making love to her. It was not long before the world was again astonished by the publication of an elopement—not a harmless, sentimental affair, but a criminal elopement.

Julia was too romantic to consider the moral turpitude of the act. The pious preaching and praying of the boarding school had been lost upon her in the variety of more congenial topics that were then presented to her. The elopement was romance; she thought not of the crime.

Mr. Mason and his wife were in the deepest distress. Mr. Winchel called at her father's store, and stated the particulars of their domestic experience. It was plain to both that the distaste for home was traceable to the loss of the domestic element of the misguided wife.

Julia and her seducer—we wrong him—both were guilty—were heard from in New Orleans; but the villain soon became tired of her whims, and left her, but she died a few years later, a ruined, abandoned, off-cast creature, the victim of false education.

Mr. Mason's remaining daughters were not sent to the boarding school. They received the best education to be had in the city, and there are noted institutions of learning there. They were thus kept constantly under the watchful care of their parents, and the domestic element in their natures was not unsettled by absence from home while the plastic mind was being moulded into its shape for life.

A STORY ABOUT A KISS.

We have frequently noticed that the stadiest old maids have the most liberal notions of kissing. Frederika Bremer, with a geniality, eminently Christian, has never a gentle word for the impulsive lover, if his heart is honest. We find this little story in her last book:

"In the University of Upsal, in Sweden, lived a young student—a lonely youth, with a great love for studies, but without means for pursuing them. He was poor and without connections. Still he studied, living in great poverty, but keeping a cheerful heart; and trying not to look at the future, which looked so grimly at him. His good humor and good qualities made him beloved by his comrades. Once he was standing with some of them in the great square of Upsala prating away as hour of leisure, when the attention of the young men became arrested by a very young and elegant lady who, at the side of an elderly one, walked slowly over the place. It was the daughter of the Governor of Upland, living in the city, and the lady with her was her governess. She was generally known for her beauty, and the goodness and gentleness of her character; and was looked upon with great admiration by the student. As the young man now stood silently looking gazing at her, as she passed on like a graceful vision, one of them exclaimed:—'Well it would be worth something to have a kiss from such a mouth!' The poor student the hero of our story, who was looking intently on the pure angelic face, exclaimed as if by inspiration, "Well I think I could have it." 'What!' cried his friends in chorus, 'are you crazy?' Do you know her?' &c.—'Not at all,' he answered; but I think she would kiss me, just now, if I asked her.'—What in this place, and before all our eyes? 'Freely!' 'Freely?' 'Well if she will give you a kiss in that manner, I will give you a thousand dollars!' exclaimed one of the party. 'And I?' 'and I?' cried three or four others, for it so happened that several rich young men were in the group, and bets ran high on so improbable an event, and the challenge was made and received in less time than it takes to relate it.

Our hero—my authority tells us not whether he was handsome or plain—I have my peculiar reasons for believing he was not plain, but singularly good looking—our hero immediately walked to meet the young lady, 'My fortune is in your hand.' She looked at him with astonishment but arrested her steps.

He proceeded to state his name and position his aspirations, and related truly and simply what had passed between him and his companions. The young lady listened attentively, and when he had ceased to speak, she said blushing but with sweetness "If by so little a thing so much can be affected, it would be foolish in me to refuse your request," and she kissed the young man publicly in the square.

Next day the young student was sent for by the Governor. He wanted to hear the young man who dared to ask a kiss of his daughter in that way and whom she had granted it to. The result of the visit was that the young man was sent to the University of Upsal, with a handsome purse, and the promise of further assistance, if he continued to study as he had done. The Governor had taken a liking to him, that he offered him a place at his table during his studies at Upsala.

Our young student now pursued his studies in a manner which soon made him regarded as the most promising scholar at the university. Three years were now passed since the first kiss, when the young man was allowed to give a second one to the lovely daughter of the Governor as his intended bride.

He became, later, one of the great scholars of Sweden, as much respected for his learning as for his character. His works will endure forever among the works of science, and from his happy union sprung a family well known in Sweden in the present day, and whose wealth of fortune and his high position in society are regarded as small things, compared with the wealth of goodness and love.'

THE IRISH IN AMERICA.

Time works great changes in the Irish, wether in the United States or the colonies. They are the few among the many. They cannot long maintain their distinctive character; they become gradually absorbed, and are soon incorporated with the mass of the people. They adopt the dress, the habits, and the feelings of the Americans. Their clergy taught them to disregard a Protestant Sovereign; the Americans, in their turn, teach them to disregard their priests; thus one half of their lives is spent in learning what is wrong, and the other in unlearning it. Renunciation is soon followed by renunciation, and the Queen and Pope both lose their subjects. By this process, the emigrants are protected from themselves and their own violence; they individually obtain that freedom which, collectively, they never allowed to each other. A Roman Catholic who becomes a Protestant in Ireland is considered as a man who deserts his colours, and he is pursued and punished by the whole community. In America he is neither hailed as a convert by one side, nor insulted as a pervert by the other.—The event is regarded by the former with unconcern, and by the latter as an occurrence rather to be regretted than resented. Public opinion tolerates and protects every sect, but has no sympathy with any. Religion is left to shift for itself, the supply is regulated by the demand, and competition has lowered its value by adopting an inferior material, and coarse workmanship. The original emigrant retains with some difficulty the creed he received from his priest; his faith is less lively, but still he is a believer. It is different with his descendants, who often exercise their own judgment and chose for themselves. But, though he adheres to his Church, his habits are altered and improved he becomes industrious and his condition is ameliorated. His kind-hearted and affectionate feelings are not merely preserved, but enchanced by distance. He works hard to save, and he saves to import his relatives to the comfortable home he has provided for them in the West. The Irish poor are rich in love—in love for their parents, their children, their friends, and their countrymen. No one is so destitute, but that he will give of his last loaf and divide the last sixpence with one poorer or more destitute than he is, and, when all is gone, he mingles benedictions on others with prayers for himself. Poor Pat!—Season Ticket, in Dublin University Magazine.

ROUGHNESS OF THE LION'S TONGUE.

"Every one who cares for cats, and who in consequence is cared for by those graceful creatures, is familiar with the roughness of pussy's tongue, as she licks the hand of her human friend. This peculiarity of formation is the more conspicuous because it presents so great a contrast with the wet, smooth tongue of the dog; and, as a general rule, men are more accustomed to the lingual caresses of the dog than of the cat. The cause of the strangely dry tongue of the Felidæ is at once seen by reference to the tongue of a Lion or Tiger, or by applying a magnifying glass to the tongue of a domestic cat. The entire surface of the tongue is covered with innumerable conical projections, which are so curved that their points tie towards the throat. On the central line of the tongue these projections are larger than at the side. Their chief, if not their only use, is to aid the cat in stripping the flesh from the bones of the animals which it has killed, and so prevent the least avoidable waste of nutriment. Truly, in Nature the economical system reigns supreme, and waste is an impossibility. So strongly made are these amatures, that the constant licking of a cat's tongue will remove the living tissues from a delicate skin, while the tongue of the lion can rapidly cause the outflow of blood. There is a well-authenticated anecdote of a tame lion cub and its owner, which exhibits strongly the rasping power of the feline tongue. A gentleman had indulged himself in that rather dangerous pet, a tame lion cub. The animal was very fond of its master, and would play with him as guilelessly as if it were a kitten.—One day the gentleman fell asleep, leaving one of his hands hanging over the side of his couch. His pet lion came up to the couch when its master was slumbering, and by way of showing its affection, began to lick the exposed hand. In a very short time the rough file-like tongue cut through the delicate skin of the hand, and caused some little pain, and a slight effusion of blood, which was eagerly licked off by the animal. The pain which was caused by the too affectionate creature awoke its master who naturally began to withdraw his hand from the caresses of the lion. But at the first movement the lion uttered a short deep growl, which was repeated in a menacing manner at each attempt to remove the hand from its dangerous and painful position. Seeing that the lion cub had become suddenly transformed from a domestic pet to a wild beast, whose hand for the first time tasted blood, and thirsted for more its owner quietly slipped his other hand under his pillow where he kept a ready-loaded pistol and shot the beast dead through the head.—If ever an evil thing sprung up against its will, but was the only course which he could have adopted in order to preserve his own life. There are many instances recorded of the affection of lions for their keepers, and there is no doubt that they are capable of strong attachment, but they are also capable of treachery, and when they do turn upon their benefactors, they do so with a ferocity which is quite unknown to the tiger. If a person can succeed in making friends with a lion, he may be pretty certain that the animal will never attack him, unless, indeed, some sudden impulse should arise, which would be quite beyond the control of the animal's will."—Knowledge's Illustrated Natural History by Wood.

Odds and Ends.

If a man be gracious to strangers it shows that he is a citizen of the world, and that his heart is not an island cut off from other lands, but a part of the continent that joins them.

TIMELY WIT.—Sheridan was staggering home one night when he was observed by a policeman, to whom he said confidentially —"My name is Wilberforce—I am a religious man—don't expose me."

In a Bombay paper the following appears—"Wanted by a European youth, a wife when he attains the age of 22 years. His present age is 19."

We run the risk of experiencing the greatest disgust if we observe too closely how government, justice and mockery are managed.

Ned was arguing in favor of giving woman the elective franchise. "Why shouldn't women vote as well as men—are they not capable of forming correct opinions on political subjects? Many a woman knows more than her husband."

"That may be," said Jim, "but do you suppose I'd have rascally politicians come electioneering with my wife? Ned was silenced.

—"Tell me, my dear, what is the cause of those tears."

"O! such disgrace! I have opened one of your letters, supposing it to be addressed to myself. Certainly it looked more like Mrs. than Mr."

"Is that all? What harm can there be in a wife opening her husband's letters?"

"But the contents! Such a disgrace!"

"What! has any one dared to write me a letter unfit for my wife to read?"

"Oh, no. It is couched in the most chaste language. But the disgrace!"

The husband eagerly caught up the letter and commenced reading the epistle that had been the means of nearly breaking his wife's heart. Reader you couldn't guess the cause in an age. It was no other than a bill from a printer for a three years' subscription!

Patrick McFinnigan; with a one-wheeled car, ran a race with a locomotive; as the latter went out of sight Mac cried: "Ah wid ye, ye roorin' blaggard, or I'll be after running into yees."

In a country parish in Scotland lived two maiden sisters. One took suddenly sick and died. The other was naturally bewailing her bereavement when the parish preacher entered to console her in her affliction, when the following conversation took place:

"It was a sudden call, indeed," droaned the parson, "but let us hope for the best!"

"Oh! yes," said the maid, heaving a heavy sigh, "I hope she's in Beelzebub's bosom."

"In Abraham's bosom you mean" interrupted the good shepherd.

"Well, it is one of the saints, and I'm certain she's not particular which, she could make herself at home anywhere."

The minister preached a sermon the Sunday following from a text which some of his congregation have not yet forgotten.

A quaint old minister of a parish in Lanarkshire one Sunday morning gave his text from the Psalms—"I said in my haste all men were liars" and began his sermon by thoughtfully saying, "Ay, David, you said it in your haste, did ye! If you had lived in this parish you might have said it at your leisure!"

AQUATICS IN HALIFAX.

The race for the championship of Halifax Harbour was run on Wednesday week —distance 1¼ miles. Bernard Gallagher the champion of last year, came in at the head of the three, and George Lovett led the whites. The two unsuccessful pullers then went over the course again, and Lovett came off victor, as the champion's belt, which must be won five times before becoming the property of one individual, changes hands this year. The boat pulled by Lovett was named the Lady Stuart.—She is made of tin, and was constructed by John Boddick, a tinsmith.

THE MOTHER MOLDS THE MAN.

That it is the mother who molds the man is a sentiment beautifully expressed by the recorded observations of a shrewd writer: "When I lived among the Cherokee Indians I held a consultation with one of their chiefs respecting the successive stages of their progress in the arts of civilized life; and among other things he informed me that at their start they fell into a great mistake—they only sent boys to school. These boys came home intelligent men, but they married uneducated and uncivilized wives, and the uniform result was, their children were all like their mothers. The father also lost all interest in both wife and children. 'And now,' said he 'if we would advance but one step of our children we must educate the girls, for when they become mothers they educate the children.' If women are ignorant, children are ignorant; if women are vicious, children are vicious. If women are treated like outcasts, children are treated as such in a great degree qualified to discharge the duties of life and have much of education."

Notice for Correspondents.

1. Supposing you wish to contribute to a public charity, send your money to the Editor of a newspaper. He must acknowledge the receipt of it, and so you get your name and benevolence advertised in the best part of the paper for nothing.

2. Another good method, if you are fond of appearing before the public, is to request the Editor to state that 'the Richard Jones in the police report of yesterday, is not Mr. Richard Jones, the respected chiropodist, of Sackville street.'

3. If you are writing to a political newspaper, never mind about writing on two sides of a paper, as depend upon it, it will be a recommendation in your favor if the editor sees you can write on both sides.

4. You need not be particular about writing legibly, as if stands to reason, if the Editor cannot read your letter, that you will be spared the mortification of reading in the next day's Notice to Correspondents that Philo-Justicia is an ass.'

5. It is usual in wording a statement, which impugnes the character of another person, to send your name and address with it; but, as in matters of libel, this is a very troublesome, as well as a very expensive plan, it is better to send any body's else's card rather than your own. By this means you avoid publicity, and have the double gratification of annoying two persons at once.

6. Inserting your death one day, and contradicting it the next, is another very cheap plan of advertising in a newspaper. Besides you have the advantage of learning in your lifetime what your friends think of you after your death. This plan, however will only answer once.

7. Be careful of quotations, especially in a foreign language. Most editor knows his own language well, it is as much as you have a right to expect from him.

8. Never send any thing to a newspaper to be continued, unless it is a legacy or a dozen of port.

9. Never trouble yourself in calling to see the Editor of a newspaper. It is a strange circumstance, but you might call a hundred times and always find him 'out.' —Punch.

Dying Innocent in the Penitentiary.

In the year 1853, three brothers, by the name of Shea, (Patrick, John and Dennis,) living in the county of Donegal, Ireland, having heard of a land of liberty, where the down-trodden and oppressed of all nations are received and welcomed, tore themselves away from their aged parents, the scenes of their childhood and land of their birth, with the intentions of making enough money, to bring their loved parents to the country of their intended adoption. Two of them were men, but Dennis, the hope and pride of his aged parents, was but a boy of seventeen years, full of youthful ardor. After receiving the blessing of their parents, they crossed the ocean and landed in New York.—They shortly started to find employment. The eldest stopped in New Jersey, the next found a place in Pennsylvania, and Dennis came to Ohio with an acquaintance, and found his way to one of our public works, near Athens, where there were a number of his countrymen employed.

Not long after he arrived, on one of their holidays, two or three citizens were passing along the road and found Dennis Shea, with a dying man at a spring. Dennis carried him there and was engaged in washing his face and cooling the temples of his dying countryman. Those who found him in this position charged him with murder, arrested him, and conveyed him to Athens and lodged him in jail. The man died without being able to communicate any of the facts of the case, and the story of poor Dennis was not believed. He was tried at the March term of the Court in that county in 1854 found guilty of murder in the second degree and sentenced to the Ohio Penitentiary for life. He arrived there on the 11th of April following, at that time but 18 years of age.—Immediately after his confinement, he began to dwindle away, and he told the narrator of these facts that he could not survive a year, and wished his brothers to be ignorant of his misfortune and disgrace.

In the month of September following he took his bed, and sent a message to our informant. He wished for a Priest, and said he would not die without making his peace with God.

Father Meaher was sent, and in the presence of the Warden, Mr. Wilcox, and our informant, he told his simple story. The dying boy was shrived by the priest of his religion—said that he would now die in peace and in a few minutes all was over.

He stated on his death bed, (and it is substantiated by Lot L. Smith, Esq., a lawyer of Athens, and formerly Private Secretary to Gov. Medill,) that there existed an old feud between what they call the Fardowns and Corkonians—that a few of them had met near the spring on that day, in the absence of Dennis, and had a fight, when they left this man for dead and made good their escape.

Dennis came along a short time afterward and found him dragged on to the spring, and like a "Good Samaritan," was trying to restore consciousness to the dying man, when he was caught in the charitable act —his story discredited—hurried through the form of trial—without money and without friends, and sentenced at the youthful age of eighteen, to drag out a miserable existence within the gloomy walls of the Ohio Penitentiary—and innocent, too. What wonders that he sickened—that he died!

A STORM IN A HORSE'S HEAD.

Mr. Matthew Upright's black horse, which bore the herald in the Torontonian pageant on Monday week, was taken ill on the Thursday following, and died on Wednesday last. Mr. Arnold opened the body, and discovered in one of the main sheets of the vessels an enormous stone, about oval and smooth, apparently of a sandy nature, but very hard. The stone weighs about three ounces, and is about three quarters of a inch long. This accounts for the horse's death. The stone is of the kind called the Dolphin Jem, and it is intended to be sent to the Museum of the College of [illegible]

GREAT FIRE IN THOROLD.

LOSS $35,000!

THE THOROLD AND NIAGARA MILLS AND "THOROLD HOUSE" BURNED DOWN.

From the Thorold Gazette Extra.

Thorold, August 6, 1859.

Last evening about a quarter to eleven o'clock, a fire broke out in the store house of the Thorold Mills, and in a few minutes the whole building was one mass of conflagration.

The fire company was promptly on the spot immediately after the alarm was given, but efforts to keep the fire under was unavailing.

From the Thorold Mills the fire extended to the Niagara Mills, and to the opposite buildings on Front-street, destroying in its course, in addition to the Thorold and Niagara Mills, the Thorold house, seven dwelling houses, and several stables, barns, and other outhouses, and causing a loss of about $35,000.

To the south of the street the fire extended to Mr. Dougan's store, corner of Front and Albert streets, and to the north to Mr. Macdonald's residence, both of which very narrowly escaped.

The buildings opposite the Thorold House and on the east side of the street, several times caught the flames, but with great exertions they were kept under.

The Thorold Fire Company exerted themselves in the most praiseworthy manner, and were well assisted by the rest of the people of the town. In about an hour and a half they managed to arrest the progress of the devouring element, and had it not been for their energetic actions, the loss would have been far more serious.

The St. Catharines Rescue Fire Company No. 1, and Hose and Hook and Ladder Company No. 1, arrived in the village about the time the fire was first got under and rendering good assistance.

The scene when the fire reached the Front-street was most appealing. Every article of furniture, &c., in every house on both sides, from Albert-street to the lower end of Front-street, was removed; and the bustle and confusion which existed can be better imagined than described.

The following are the buildings burnt down and the loss sustained as far as can now be ascertained:—

The Thorold Mills—Band and Hutchison—loss including stock of wheat, flour, &c., $14,000; insured for $8,000. Niagara Mills—Alexander W. Chisholm—loss, including stock, $14,000; partially insured. Thorold House—Joseph Ashford—loss $4,000; uninsured. William Ramsay—dwelling-house—loss $1,000; uninsured.—Robert Booth—dwelling-house—loss $1,200; insured for $900. Mrs. Marley—two dwelling-houses—loss $1,600; insured for $800. Richard Birbeck—dwelling-house—loss $1,000; uninsured. W. B. Hendershot—two dwelling-houses, loss $1,000; uninsured. Stables and out-houses belonging to several parties, loss $1,000; mostly uninsured.

Much damage has been occasioned to goods, household furniture, &c., in addition to the above, which cannot be now estimated.

The cause of the fire is still unknown, but it is generally believed to have been set on fire by sparks from the funnel of a propeller which passed about ten o'clock.

Messrs. Band and Hutchison left the mill office about half-past nine o'clock, and no one of them or there employees had been in the store-house for several hours previously.

The Austrian Press on the New Treaty.

The language of the semi official Vienna press is measured and cold, but betrays great bitterness. Its severest declamations are, of course, reserved for Prussia, but there is no trace of forgiveness for France. All the papers dwell upon the fact, noticed in the Emperor's subsequent proclamation, that Prussia and England would have favoured less easy terms of peace than the French Emperor was ready to concede.—The Ost Deutsche Post declares that the neutral powers have forfeited their right to be consulted in the pacification. A European Congress inadmissible; an Italian Congress, however, inevitable. A comparison of this language with that which our Turin correspondent tells us is held in that capital will tell us for whose honour the project of an Italian Confederation was put forward. The Austrian journalist, however, anticipates its meeting with anxiety. "What an ocean of intrigues," he exclaims, "will await us there. The ambition of Piedmont the exclusiveness of Naples, the exigency of the Church, will come into violent collision. The execution of the preliminaries of peace of which the proposal of a Confederation is a weak point will prove anything but easy." It is singular to remark that the Emperor of Austria in his address says he was obliged to make peace because he could not find allies; whilst the Emperor Napoleon in his proclamation told us he made peace to avoid a general European war. How are we to reconcile the two assertions.

Pay the Printer.

BY NELLIE WAY.

PAY THE PRINTER. Yes, we say again, pay the printer, and if we could speak in tones of thunder, we would reiterate the words in the ears of every delinquent week, until he was glad to walk up to the mark, and fork over. Why, man alive, what on earth are you thinking about, sitting there, cursing over newspapers, fooling on their contents, while you owe the printer?

No wonder you feel huff with the editorials, and criticise the contributors, for no one is ever united with newspapers, or anything else, until they pay for them.——Don't write me, because I tell you the truth, and look on the you had just been detected in robbing Dame Haggins's goose pen; better by half act like an honest man owe your debts and pay the printer. Yes, pay him for a year's subscription in advance and see how you will feel after doing such a remarkable deed; try it for once—just for the fun of testing the truth of what we say. Why sir when you take from the office a newspaper that is your's—not the proprietors—you will be as independent as Alexander Sultan, and as pleased as the" you had sent your constituent [with no name.]" There's magic in the word subs. Try it one year prepaid to be a Christian! What a pity Punch couldn't have your subscription when in favor the pictures of a hypocrite, he would undoubtedly have created a previous for nothing more and no more unusual distinction.

Pay the printer, and death gnawing behind bushes, and passing through windows when a stranger enters into the house, for fear he is so, upset, bound enthusing subscriptions. Shooting your boys in both the thing is the case; pay the printer, and the only thing to be done is to pay the printer.

your threats to stop my paper, which you never paid for.

The fact is, we all work ahead, and if we accidently step on your toes, or hit your corns why all we have to say is, that you must keep them in a proper place. It's no use to find fault with truth, for truth is a sharp weapon to contend with—so wake up to a sense of duty, and pay the printer, in hard cash, but if promises, for promises never brought a dinner or the baby a frock; neither will they keep an "old bachelor" from starving—if they would, the first thing we would do, would be to draw up a petition, and present it to the Legislature, praying that none but "those doomed to walk the earth alone should occupy an editorial chair." In course they would grant the petition for they would at once see the the propriety of having people promoted who did not require anything more than promises to sustain them. But, unfortunately, even "old bachelors" can't exist on promises, though they sometimes believe in them, in times of political excitement, and come off terribly about as well as a fish caught in a net—they wriggle and wriggle and that's all the good it does.

For shame, man! not to pay the printer. It's worse than stealing pennies off a dead man's eyes, and that is about as mean as going into a neighbors house, and reading his paper before he has had a chance to look in it, and then say the paper "isn't worth taking." That's what we call worse than stealing, and there's no chance of teaching such people honesty or politeness, only by beating into them with something that will make an impression. Finally, we say pay the printer—pay up, for they're "written for glory and printed for fun" too long now.—Hutchens Gazette.

Our Common Schools and their Enemies.

It is the duty of every Government to provide education for the people, and some of the Governments of Europe and America are now most nobly executing this part of their duty. In Germany, Holland, and Switzerland, national education is advancing with astonishing rapidity, and in some districts where half-a-century ago the inhabitants were semi-barbarian, civilization and intelligence are now blooming in the moral wilderness. We in Canada have also obtained the same blessing, and scarcely have we been allowed to enjoy it ere interested parties in our midst proclaim that our Common Schools are so many agents in hands of sectarians intent on seducing children from the faith of their parents; but we challenge them to prove their assertion. They want Separate Schools, and they who advocate them are the friends of State Churchism, and we contend that the system of education upheld by them tends to contract rather than expand the mind of the pupil.—We remember of once being told that dog-fanciers succeeded in producing the race of tiny lap-dogs by giving gin to them while young and thus preventing their further growth, and true or false it will serve to illustrate our present subject. The main end of the advocates of separate schools is to hinder the free developement of the youthful mind, and to produce a race of intellectual dwarfs. Habits of enquiry constitute just the one thing they labor to prevent—independence of mind the cardinal sin the youngsters are taught to shun. To do what they are told, do think as they are taught, to submit to tyranny without asking wherefore; to be mere reading and writing machines do subserve the purposes of the powerful—mere living copies of a primer and prayer-book—this is what our rising generation will gain by the generous mind of such parties. We would ask thinking men how far is their judgment the State Church has displayed a friendly feeling towards general education. Can the fact be denied that were it not for the efforts of Dissenters in Britain the population of that country would be in a worse state to-day as respects education than they were two centuries ago. What plans for the intellectual elevation of the masses originated with the State Church when in the zenith of its power? Has not its bitter hostility uniformly stood in the way of the patriotism and philanthropy of others, whenever the object has been the diffusion of knowledge? Did it command the "march of intellect" of which the last 30 years has been the witness? We shall not insult the reader's memory by continuing such interrogations. The last stands recorded in history and no effrontery can efface it, no sophistry can wrench it out of its place, that up to a very recent period the State Church not only neglected the education of the masses, but discouraged it, frowned upon it, and pointed ridicule at the men who entered upon the glorious work. If such men in England have not succeeded, it is not for want of will. To a terrible extent they have prevailed, and the rural districts of England offer a proof of more of the fact.

Let the people of Upper Canada take warning. Let them profit by past example and studiously endeavour to their capacity an advance to classic gaol, but the friends to our School system on their representatives, and in doing so they will secure and transmit the boon to posterity.

Remember the Concert in the Town Hall to-night.

Public Meeting.

Pursuant to notice a meeting of the ratepayers was held in the Town Hall on Saturday evening last to consider the Market By-law.

The Mayor was called to the Chair, and Mr. Wm. Johnston to act as Secretary.

After the Chairman had stated the object for which the meeting was called, and invited the opinions of the ratepayers, Wm. Landy Esq., moved, seconded by Jas. Harvey, Esq.

"That this meeting believing that the establishment of a public market where the buyer and seller can meet for the transaction of business must be naturally advantageous, and believing that the By-law No. ——, for the establishment of a market in the Town of Peterboro' is calculated, (if honestly carried out) to produce this result, strongly deprecate any interference with the said By-law at least until it shall have had a fair trial, and experience will have proved what amendments may be expedient in its minor details to render its general working more efficient."

The mover and seconder, and Messrs. Bernhem and White spoke in favor of the motion. Messrs. Forgeson, Hall, Clenton, and Conger spoke against the motion and the By-law. Messrs. Hazlitt and Heathorn made an effort to be heard, but to no effect. Individuals (not rate-payers) who generally make it a business to attend such meetings for the purpose of creating disturbance were on hand, and carried their point. The Mayor again and again attempted to restore order, but to no purpose, and if he, on rising the second time to read the resolution had read the riot act instead it would not have been much out of place. Finally a vote was taken, and the Mayor declared the resolution carried.—The meeting then broke up.

ROBBERY—The store of Messrs. Cowpar & Ogilvy, George street, was broken into early Saturday morning last, and a number of articles stolen. Fortunately no money was left in the store the night previous excepting about $1 in copper coin, which was carried off. The thieves decamped leaving a candle burning from which part of the shelving ignited, but the fire did not spread far, otherwise the consequences might have been serious.

SUNDAY SCHOOL PIC-NIC—On Tuesday last the children of the Sunday School in connection with the Church of Scotland, accompanied by the teachers, parents, and congregation, held a pic-nic on the beautiful grounds of Mrs. Kirkpatrick, at the west end of the Town. After a bountiful repast, addresses were delivered by the pastor Mr. Douglas, and other gentlemen. The day was favorable and everything passed off pleasantly, all present seeming to enjoy themselves to their content. On separating the party expressed their thanks to Mrs. Kirkpatrick for her hospitality and kindness.

SPORT AHEAD.—A game at Cricket will be played on the grounds in Ashburnham to-day between the Cobourg and Peterboro' Clubs. Wickets to be pitched at 10 o'clock, a. m.

Preparations are being made by the Peterboro' Celtic Game Club to have a gala day soon. Prizes will be offered for the best players, and great competition may be expected.

The Little Lake regatta which comes off next month promises to be more than usually interesting. Arrangements are being made for a splendid occasion.

We understand that a great Regatta is to come off at Cobourg about the 23rd inst. Hart and a number of other aquatic celebrities are expected to be present. Our American cousins speak of trying their hand with old Kanuck, several boats from Rochester and neighborhood being likely to enter the contest.

CIRCUS—Joe Pentland's Circus shows in this Town on Tuesday next. Our contemporaries west, where this troupe has exhibited, speak highly of their performances.

TOWN COUNCIL.

Monday, Aug. 9th 1859.

The Council met. All present.

Minutes of previous meeting read and confirmed.

A petition asking the Council to repair the side-walk on Water St., opposite the Market Square was referred to the Committee on Streets and Bridges.

The Mayor read the report of Judge Boucher to the Committee of Crown Lands.

A communication from John Fowler in reply to the letter addressed by the Mayor, asking for the interest due by him, was read and received.

A petition from John Waterson praying for abatement of the fine imposed on him in the Police Court was read and received.

The Clerk read the certificate of the approval of the Separation By-law by the rate-payers, on the 5th inst. The vote stood 50 for By-law, 1 against.

A communication from the Secretary of the Board of School Trustees, naming the amount required from the Town, for 1859, was read and referred to the Finance Committee.

A petition from M. Martin, M.P.P., complaining of the injurious effect of the present Market By-law, was read and received.

A report from the Finance Committee recommending the payment of the salary of Mr. Royce as Inspector of Buildings for 1859. Also that the town due on the property leased by Clark & Buchan, be charged from rental to August (plus); was read and received.

Two petitions asking for repairs of sidewalks were handed to Councillor Green Streets and Bridges.

Moved and seconded,—That the chairman of the Committee of Streets be authorized to order the rate of interest to be charged on all arrears of taxes, &c., due to the Town, from the 1st day of August next, and that the Treasurer be instructed to collect the same.

Moved and carried,—That the Treasurer be instructed to pay the Chief Constable the sum of $1 per day for each day he has been employed in the service of the Corporation, and that the Chief Constable be instructed to keep an account of the number of days he has been employed.

A By-law to amend the present Market By-law.

Moved and carried,—That Mr. Waterson be informed that the prayer of his petition cannot be entertained by the Council.

Moved and seconded,—That the Mayor be authorized to procure plans and specifications for a verandah around the Market House, in accordance with the report of the Special Committee on the 30th of June last.—Carried.

The Council then adjourned for one week.

THE CONFERENCE.

SPEECH OF LOUIS NAPOLEON.

MANIFESTO OF THE EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA.

PARIS.—The Plenipotentiaries of the Conference to be held at Zurich are M. Bourqueney for France, and Count Colloredo for Austria. The representative for Sardinia is not yet known.

The meeting at Zurich will open its sittings in ten days or a fortnight at the latest. The period for the deliberations of the Congress, or Conference, which is to succeed the Zurich meeting, is not yet fixed.

THE EMPEROR'S ADDRESS TO THE SENATE AND THE LEGISLATIVE BODY.

Since the announcement of peace, no more important document has been issued than the official report of the speech of the Emperor Napoleon in answer the complimentary addresses of the Senate and the Legislative Body. In this speech the Emperor anticipates every objection which he thinks likely to occur, and boldly acknowledges that he has failed to carry out his programme. His language is terse and pointed, and however much his opponents may differ from him, they cannot refuse to acknowledge the ability of his address.

His Excellency, Mr. Troplong, President of the Senate, first addressed the Emperor, and was followed by the Count de Morny, President of the Legislative Body after which the Emperor replied as follows:

"Gentlemen,—Finding myself again in the midst of you, who during my absence have shown so much devotion to the Empress and to my son, I feel first of all the desire to thank you, and then to explain to you the motives of my conduct.

"When after a successful campaign of two months, the French and Sardinian armies pitched their camp before the walls of Verona, the struggle was evidently on the point of undergoing a change in a military as well as in a political point of view. I was fatally obliged to attack in front an enemy intrenched behind great fortresses, protected against any diversion on his flanks by the neutrality of the territories which surround him; and in commencing the long sterile war of sieges I found in presence of me Europe in arms, ready either to dispute our success or to aggravate our reverse.

"Nevertheless, the difficulty of the enterprise would neither have shaken my resolution nor stopped the enthusiasm of my army had the means been out of proportion with the results to be expected. It was necessary to resolve boldly to break through the barriers raised by neutral territories, and then to accept the struggle on the Rhine as well as on the Adige. It came to this—to accept everywhere the support of revolution. More precious blood must have been shed, and enough has been shed already; in a word, to succeed it was necessary to stake what no Sovereign ought to stake, unless the independence of his country is in danger.

"If, then, I stopped short, it was not from weariness and exhaustion, not from abandonment of the noble cause I wish to serve, but because a voice voice spoke within my heart—'The interests of France.'

"Do you imagine it cost me nothing to put a break upon the ardour of my soldiers, who, excited by victory, wished to advance?

"Do you suppose it cost me nothing publicly in the face of Europe to curtail from my programme the territory which extends from the Mincio to the Adriatic?

"Do you imagine that it cost me nothing to behold many noble illusions destroyed in honest hearts, patriotic hopes extinguished?

"To cause Italian independence I waged war against the grain of Europe. As soon as the destinies of my country was imperilled I concluded peace.

"And can it now be said that our efforts and sacrifices are a pure loss? No. As I said in my farewell address to my soldiers, we have a right to be proud of this short campaign. In four combats and two battles a powerful army, inferior to none in organization and bravery has been defeated.—The King of Piedmont, once styled the Guardian of the Alps, has seen his country delivered from invasion, and the frontier line of his States extended from the Tiejno to the Mincio. The idea of nationality is admitted by its warmest opponents. All the Sovereigns of the Italian Peninsula understand at last the imperious necessity of salutary reform.

"Thus after having given a new proof of the military power of France, the peace which I have just concluded will be fruitful of happy results; the future will reveal their daily more for the happiness of Italy, the influence of France, the quiet of Europe."

MANIFESTO OF THE EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA

By comparing the speech of the Emperor of the French and the manifesto of the Emperor of Austria, and perusing also the address of the Prince Regent of Prussia, our readers will be in possession of the main features necessary to a correct understanding of the situation of political affairs in connection with the Italian question. The substance of the Emperor of Austria's address is as follows:—

"When all concessions that were allowable and compatable with dignity have been exhausted there is no room for choice, and what cannot be avoided, becomes a duty.

"This duty placed me under the stern necessity of demanding from my people new and painful sacrifices, which arguments if possible, the profound affection which I feel for them, and which inspired the assurance that the just cause in defence of which my brave armies went forth with enthusiasm to the contest would be victorious.

"Unhappily the result has not corresponded with the general effort, and the fortune of war has not yet been favourable to us.

"The valiant army of Austria has in this supreme crisis proved of its tried heroism and its unquenchable perseverance, as brilliant deed it has commanded the admiration of all, even of its enemies.

"It is not less perfectly established that our enemies, in spite of the greatest efforts, have been able to obtain only advantages not a decisive victory; while the Austrian army, still unvanquished by the same power, and full of the same courage, maintained a position, the possession of which left perhaps a necessity of recovering from the enemy all the advantages that he had gained. But the object of this struggle, it would seem, is not to gather new conquests, but to conclude a peace which must have been already often closed which have been made already, and which have deeply affected my heart.

"Under these conditions it was my duty as a Sovereign to take into serious consideration the propositions of peace which had been made to me. Notwithstanding, success would have appeared doubtful, since I have been so bitterly deceived in my well-founded hopes that this contest not having been entered into for the defence of the rights of Austria only, I should not be left alone in it.

"In spite of the ardent sympathy worthy of acknowledgment which the justice of our cause has inspired, for the most part, in the government and people of Germany, our natural allies, most ancient allies also, have obstinately refused to recognise the great importance of the grand question of the day. Consequently Austria would have been obliged alone to face the events which were being prepared for, and which every day might have rendered more grave.

"The honour of Austria coming intact out of this war, thanks to the heroic efforts of her valiant army, I have resolved, yielding to political considerations, to make a sacrifice for the re-establishment of peace, for I have acquired the conviction that I should obtain in any event conditions less unfavourable in coming to a direct understanding with the Emperor of the French, without the blending of any third party whatsoever, than in causing to participate in the negotiations the three great Powers which have taken no part in the struggle. On the other hand, it must be agreeable to my heart to see the blessings of peace assured afresh to my beloved people, because they will me the necessary leisure for bestowing henceforth all my attention and solicitude on the task that I propose to accomplish—that is to say to found in a durable manner the internal well-being and the external power of Austria by the development of her moral and material forces, and by ameliorations conformable to the spirit of the time in legislation and administration.

"As chief of the army I have already expressed to it, in a special order of the day, my acknowledgment of its bravery.—To-day I renew the expression of these sentiments. While I speak to my people I thank those of their children who have fought for God, their Emperor, and their country. I thank them for the heroism of which they have given proof, and I shall always remember with grief those of our brave companions in arms who have not also returned from the combat.

THE PRINCE REGENT OF PRUSSIA TO HI ARMY.

The following order of the day to the army has been published:—

"At the moment when war broke out between two neighbouring great Powers, I had ordered the army to be placed in readiness for war, in order to maintain that position of power which belongs to Prussia.—The danger which threatened us then is over. While you were still marching to occupy positions I had ordered for you the belligerent Powers suddenly concluded peace. Your advance had shown our firm resolution to maintain our frontiers and those of Germany inviolate whatever might be the destines of war. You have shown the readiness I had expected from you, and have maintained in general a dignity worthy of the name of Prussia. You have made many personal sacrifices, and I express to you my full satisfaction.

THE PRINCE REGENT OF PRUSSIA.

RETROSPECT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

This week has been barren of any exciting news, and all our information tends towards the peace question. Important official speeches and manifestoes have been published, which clear the political atmosphere and render the Italian question more easy of solution. Austria has officially reformed the German Diet of the re-establishment of peace, and suggested the return of the military contingents to their bonnes and the reduction of the federal fortresses to a peace footing. Peaceful navigation has resumed its march in the Adriatic and Levant; the Emperor of Austria has returned to his capital, and the Emperor of France has arrived at St. Cloud. In a short time the representatives of Austria, France, and Sardinia, will meet at Zurich, to conclude a treaty of peace. European Congress there will be none, as the two Emperors agreed at Villafranca to settle their differences without the intervention of the neutral Powers. Count Colloredo is likely to represent Austria at Zurich, and young Prince Metternich will probably go as Austrian Ambassador to Paris. Baron Hubner goes to Rome instead of Count Colloredo. It is said that the disposition of the population of Milan is not good, nor are the absurd reports published in the newspapers calculated to improve it. To-day it is said that both Venice and Bologna are in full revolution, and that Garibaldi refuses to obey. To-morrow there may appear other reports equally absurd. A war cry is, moreover, raised against the clergy, which is quite in opposition with the real sentiments of the population. The inspectors sent into Lombardy by the Sardinian Government have hitherto given proofs of great incapacity. The French army is withdrawing by degrees; some regiment left for Genoa immediately on their arrival at Milan, and it is said that the entire French army will have quitted Lombardy before the end of the month.

Count Walewski took the liberty of pointing out to the Emperor the impossibility of carrying out with success certain provisions of the treaty of peace, and it is therefore of the utmost importance that the conference should meet as early as possible. Some difficulty will occur as regards Tuscany, Modena, Parma and the Roman States, the people there protesting against the provisions of the treaty which places them without reserve at the mercy of the Sovereigns who had abandoned them.—The Emperor of the French tells us that he would not have stopped in the middle of his Italian programme—the rendering Italy free from the Alps to the Adriatic—if he had not feared to draw on a general European war. Sardinia while swallowing her humiliation, enters her retreat from the scene with decent grandeur as to have the will but the guns she has acquired. Austria declares that she has ceased to fear, now with the Emperor of the French because she has discovered that he is her best friend. In Tuscany the Consulta of State, judging it expedient to revive the electoral law of May 3, 1848, in order to consult the country as to its future destiny, published a Government decree enacting that representatives of the people are to be elected under that law for the purpose of deciding by a majority of votes what the future government of the country shall be. The electoral lists are to be immediately formed by the mayors, under the authority of the prefects. The partisans of the Duchies will most probably be aware of whatever there is at present impending, for we find the Paris newspaper Le Pays saying, "The granting of the Duchess regency to Tuscany is no longer doubtful. No one says that Piedmont is to lose a good share of them The negotiations will be speedily concluded. The rulers of these small States have not called them up to be heard finally themselves on the subject. It is for a question of high in which the British Cabinet will be trusted, many of present insurmountable difficulties will vanish.

The Swiss Government is now taking measures to put a stop once for all to the system of enrolling men in that country for the service of Italian princes. The last of the old capitulations which authorised it expired on the 15th of the present month; they will not be renewed. A delegate has been sent by the Confederation to Naples for that purpose; and the assembly protested by citizens of a liberal State serving in the army of such a prince as the late King of Naples will soon cease.

The reason why Austria accepted the peace, it is related in military circles, was that Louis Napoleon showed certain documents to the Emperor of Austria which removed any doubt he might have felt about the necessity of sacrificing Lombardy.—"The one document," says one informant "was a Franco-Anglo Russian peace project, which was based on the cession of Venetia as well as Lombardy, and the other was a dispatch, in which Prussia expressed her resolve not to draw her sword in defence of any part of the Austrian possessions in Italy."

Turning from the west we learn from Alexandria that the relations between the Pacha and the Sultan continue to be very cool, without, however, as yet any serious difference. His Highness appears to be determined to increase his army, and for that purpose the recruiting is continued throughout Egypt. He has, moreover, given orders for the purchase of 25,000 muskets, for gunboats of a new model, six rifled cannon, and various other instruments of destruction.

A conspiracy against Prince Milosch and his son Michael has been discovered at Belgrade. The former was to have been assassinated on the 11th inst., at Topschider and the latter at Selusbex. The conspirators are ex-Ministers and Senators, and the prince vows that he will put them to death although the Porte has formerly protested against his doing so.

GARIBALDI AND KOSSUTH.—What will Garibaldi and Kossuth say to this peace? is the question that occurs to every one in considering the terms and the manner of the all-unsaved treaty. Of the former we shall probably hear by some not expressive of his sentiments; of Kossuth we have private information, which, as it is, we give to our readers. M. Kossuth's family were preparing to proceed to Italy, but the news of the Peace Treaty arrested their preparations. On the evening of the 14th they received a telegram from M. Kossuth, announcing his safe arrival in Switzerland.—He thus seems to have lost no time in leaving Italy immediately on the news of the Peace Treaty, and so escaped a conference with Emperor or Kaiser. What has become of the Hungarian committee assembled at Genoa does not appear, and the elaborate schemes of revolutionising Hungary has of course disappeared with the cessation of war.

ADDRESS TO THE KING OF SARDINIA BY HIS PEOPLE.

The following address to Victor Emmanuel is circulated throughout the kingdom, and has already received numerous signatures:—

"Sire,—The deep sense of disappointment, the profound consternation which was produced throughout the country by the unforeseen announcement of a peace so different from what it had a right to expect, has been somewhat mitigated by the universal conviction that that peace was not your work, and that the name of the First Soldier of Italian Independence still remains pure, glorious, and uncontaminated.

"The national question is not solved; it has lost none of its importance; it has entered a new phase, replete with the greatest difficulty and supreme danger. But that living and that people who have been able to hold their own in a ten years struggle, and who have everywhere known how to conquer, where deceit and fate were powerless against valour, will also be able to turn out the obstacles which the future has in store. A stroke of the pen cannot shed the dictates of twenty-six millions of hearts.

"But if the nation is ready, if all the living strength of the country is prepared for the heaviest sacrifices, it is necessary that they should not be deprived of that wise and powerful direction which your Majesty and your ministry have hitherto given to popular enthusiasm.

"All can understand, O sire, what must be your sufferings. Italy, whose cry of anguish reached your heart, now understands the irresistible eloquence of your silence.

"May you be blessed—may all be blessed who fought by your side for the holiest of causes. If Italy weeps now, her independence and her liberty are worth the shedding of blood as well as tears.

"So long as you sire, shall be the champion of Italian regeneration, short will be our despondency, and, relying on herself alone, the country will feel equal to achieve a happier fate."

PROCLAMATION TO THE TUSCANS.

Much excitement having been caused by the conclusion of peace, the following proclamation was issued by the provisional ministry recently appointed by the King of Sardinia:

"Tuscans,—The news of events which interrupt the most brilliant hopes, causes a general and profound grief. The government shares your sentiments. We must not, however, give way to discouragement, and must be content to wait for ample details. Under present circumstances our task is to unite more closely than ever to show our firmness, and to prove that we are worthy to be citizens of a free and independent country. As long as we remain thus firm all our hopes will not be lost.—Citizens deputed by us are about to proceed to Turin to learn what are the real state of things. Meanwhile, remember that any extreme manifestation of your regrets will only aggravate the perils of the situation. Let us all join in maintaining order, which now more than ever is necessary for the salvation of our country. The 'consulta' will shortly meet. Jointly with it, the Government will make the voice of Tuscany heard by Victoria Emmanuel, in whom it has the fullest confidence. Tuscany will not, in spite of its will or of its rights, be replaced under either the yoke or the influence of Austria.

"Florence."

(Signed by all the Ministers.)

These simple and heartfelt words, which were thoroughly appreciated by the population, contributed to calm men's minds.

THE MEETING OF THE EMPERORS.

A letter from Verona of the 11th contains some interesting particulars concerning the interview between the two Emperors:—

This place and date will mark in history and future visitors will search of the interview of Villafranca, as that of Rolandi and that of Tilsit. I arrived here early this morning, but had I come the day before I could not have witnessed more than I did. Orders, dictated by a feeling of delicacy, had been given that only privileged persons should approach the place of the interview. Every care had been taken not to wound the pride of the Emperor of Austria, to whom it would doubtless have been disagreeable to have been exposed too much to public view. The meeting of the two sovereigns was fixed for nine o'clock. At a quarter of an hour before Napoleon III. arrived at the spot, and he came before the time in order that he might go on for a short distance to meet the Emperor of Austria. Francis Joseph soon made his appearance, and seeing that his late adversary had courteously come to receive him urged forward his horse. When the two parties had come near, the escorts stopped short, and the emperors advanced into the centre of the unoccupied space. The escort of the Emperor Napoleon was composed of Marshall Vaillant, General Martimprey, General Fleury, the officers of the imperial household and of his staff, and of a squadron of the Cent Gardes and one of the Guides, all in their splendid full dress uniforms.—His Majesty rode the fine bay horse which he has used since the commencement of the campaign. He wore the undress uniform of a general of division with the kepi. The Emperor of Austria also wore an undress cap and blue uniform frock coat, and was followed by his staff a squadron of his body guard, composed of nobles, and a squadron of hulans. It is said he was much struck with the marshal bearing of the French cavalry, and that, in presence of the Cent Gardes and the Guides, the Austrian bodyguard and the hulans did not appear to advantage. On the two Sovereigns meeting in the mid-space they courteously saluted and shook hands. The Emperor of Austria appeared pleased with the cordial welcome and open manner of the Emperor Napoleon. The two emperors remained for a moment alone in the middle of the road and exchanged a few words. They then reciprocally presented the officers of their staff, and the moment after the general officers were intermingled, and Marshal Vaillant was seen in conversation with Baron de Hess. Napoleon III. and the Emperor Francis Joseph then advanced side by side towards Villafranca, the Cent Gardes giving the precedence to the body-guard of Austria, who led the way, but the Guides passing before the hulans. At Villafranca, the house of M. Carto Morelli, situated in the principle street of the town, had been prepared to receive the two sovereigns. The Emperor of Austria had passed a night there before the battle of Solferino. It is a habitation comfortable but simple, and not remarkable for any extraordinary attraction, I had visited it early in the morning, and saw in addition to the bed-room of the Austrian Emperor, the sitting-room in which the conference was to take place some hours later. The furniture and curtains were green, and the walls painted in distemper. There were several seats of various kinds, but only two arm-chairs. In the centre was an oblong table covered with a green cloth, and on it was placed, just I entered, a vase of fresh gathered flowers, which quite perfumed the room. It was there that for an hour and a half the two emperors were seated discussing the highest interests, and without any one being present. From a feeling of delicacy, the King of Piedmont was not invited to the interview. It cannot but be allowed that the presence of a successor is always more annoying and intolerable than that of a rival or a conqueror. Whilst the interview was going on, I was outside in the street, whence I could see the escorts some remaining on their horses, while other were dismounted. Not the slightest sound was heard; every kind of conversation was suspended; and all seemed dominated involuntarily by a certain emotion produced by the importance of the incident which was passing. As to what took place inside, I cannot say anything; all that I know is that when the two sovereigns issued forth from the conference, they seemed both perfectly satisfied. The word to mount was then given, and in an instant all were in the saddle. The Emperor of Austria uttered a few words expressive of the admiration he felt for the French army, and did Marshal Vaillant, and Generals Martimprey and Fleury, the honor of shaking hands with the greatest cordiality; and the next moment each splendid cortege was on the way back to the place from which it had set out. The Emperor of the French entered Valeggio a little after eleven.

FROM A PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

The contradiction which has struck me between the assertion of the Emperor of Austria, that he had consented to a peace because he was abandoned by his natural allies, and the statement in the French Emperor's proclamation to the army—that he had put an end to the war because it was about to assume larger proportions—is noticed by a leading provincial journal of France. There is an official answer to this objection which deserves to be considered. The two statements it is said, are perfectly reconcilable in this way:—The Emperor Napoleon was perfectly warranted in saying that after another victory the war would become general, because in that case Austria would have been compelled to submit to the conditions upon which alone Prussia offered her assistance. On the other hand the Emperor of Austria truly in a certain sense, that he was abandoned by his natural allies, because Prussia with Germany at her back was only ready to help him on condition of his giving up to Prussia the long disputed preponderance in the Germanic Confederation. The French Emperor shrank from a war with Germany, not only because he doubted whether France would support him in such a vast struggle when Italian interests were at stake, but also because the effects of the war would have been to realise the unity of Germany, which it has been the policy of France ever since the time of Francis I., to prevent." Now—but this argument is rather implied than avowed—the Emperor hopes to avail himself of his intimate friendship with the Emperor of Austria to break up the Germanic Confederation, and then a war on the Rhine might be undertaken with better hopes of successful issue.

What particularly relgates the Univers, in the arrangement of Villafranca, is the fact that Lombardy was thereby transferred from one monarch to another, without the slightest semblance of a recognition of any rights on the part of the vulgar herd of people. The emperor of Austria, says the Jesuit Veuillot, "gave up as a thing what he had lost as nothing, and the French Emperor in giving Lombardy to Piedmont, also gave away as a thing what he had picked up a thing. This is in entire accordance with pure monarchal tradition. No word of any right of Lombardy to give away herself as is invoked by M. Cowour." There is but too much reason in the transaction of Villafranca for the triumphant tone of the Univers. Nevertheless, it is to be observed, that Victor Emmanuel in his Milan proclamation does not affect to accept that gift of Lombardy as a pure fulfilment made by Francis Joseph to Louis Napoleon as a trustee to his son, but founds his title upon the "affects expressed" wishes of the populations. But notwithstanding this formality it is too true that, as we know at present, the entire scheme of the Italian Confederation proceeds entirely from the will of the two despotic Emperors, expressed in their two homogeneous conferences at Villafranca. None of the Princes' pregnable hint at any other meeting of patriotic gentlemen, or peoples as being necessary to give a sanction to all the arrangements there made. The Nord of Brussels spoke yesterday of a congress, or at least a conference, as being a matter of course; but a postscript to the correspondents letter, upon which its opinion was founded, says that he doubts whether he was not mistaken in anticipating either "congress or conference." But how can it be said, as the French journals do say, that the Italian question is settled, when it remains to be seen whether the parties to the proposed confederation who were not represented at Villafranca will consent to what has been done in their name? I seriously expect to see the state of siege proclaimed all over Italy before another week is out, and "order" maintained by French and Austrian troops conjointly I can see no other rational prospect of carrying out the treaty of Villafranca. Be attendant there are troubles at Florence, where the French Emperor's pro clamation has been spat upon and defied. This news you perhaps know. I give it to you as certain, but it has of course been suppressed here.

ARRIVAL of the "NOVA-SCOTIAN."

A GENERAL DISARMAMENT.

Garibaldi's Position.

Commercial Intelligence, Markets, &c.

QUEBEC, August 8.

The Nova-Scotian, from Liverpool on the morning of the 27th ultimo, arrived here last night. Her news is not important.

The Zurich Conference had not yet met.

Prussia demands a general disarmament as a condition for taking part in the European Congress.

The Fulton was to leave Southampton on the same day as the Nova-Scotian left Liverpool. The Arabian reached Liverpool at 9.30 p. m. of the 23rd. The frigate General Admiral from New York reached Cronstadt on the 13th ult. The Hannibal left Southampton for New York on the 26th ult.

Nothing of moment had transpired with regard to the conference at Zurich, nor is it known whether Sardinia would take part in it. A despatch of the 23rd from Berlin says, however, that the representatives of the three Powers were expected to meet at the end of July.

It was vaguely rumored in Paris on the 25th that Napoleon would visit London.

The Daily News believes that, although the scheme of the Italian confederation may not have formally struck out of the programme, it is not now insisted on by its author, and that little more will be heard of it.

The French fleet had sailed from Spain, and it was reported that a portion of the French army had begun to leave Italy.

Count Parsigny had arrived at Paris from London. It is said he took with him the assurance that England would give adhesion to a Congress on condition of a general and immediate disarmament. The Paris correspondent of the Times is informed the English government offered to send representatives to the Congress, provided France disarmed; that the French Emperor agreed to do so on condition of a general disarmament by land and sea; that France will begin the movement and that the English government is very well satisfied with the conduct of the French Emperor.

The Independence Belge gives a report that the proposition for a disarmament proceeded in the first instance from Napoleon, and it is asserted that the military convention between France and Austria relative to Italy has been concluded, and that Lombardy is to take a fair share of the national debt.

The Paris Moniteur of the 26th July contains the following:—"It is endeavoured in England to attribute to France the causes of the English national burdens; but that the English people are deceived, merely in order to further the national defences. This exaggeration of our armaments is to justify a considerable increase of the budget for the army and navy. A comparison of the budgets of England and France will show these considerations to be erroneous. Since 1815 the army expenses of England have increased by two hundred million francs, making for 1860 a total of more than six hundred and fifty million francs; while the French army budget for 1860 does not and regret what improvement may be made therein.

Mr. Sidney Herbert said the government would consent to the withdrawal of the resolution, but not to the motion itself.—The government were about to appoint a committee, the report of which would be a guarantee for the completeness of its endeavours to place the great arsenals of the country in a state to resist all attacks.—Lord Palmerston said there would be too extensive an enquiry for a committee to consider what force was necessary for the defence of the country; they would only enquire what permanent fortifications were requisite for the defence of the dock-yards and arsenals.

Sir De Lacy Evans' resolution was negatived.

The proceedings in both houses on the 26th ult., were unimportant.

A fire at Liverpool, on the 26th ult., had destroyed the extensive North Shore flour and rice mills. There were four lives lost, and many injured. Loss, fifty to sixty thousand pounds, including a large quantity of grain.

A deputation from the British and foreign anti-slavery society, headed by Lord Brougham, had an interview with the Duke of Newcastle, with regard to the coolie emigration to the West Indies. They argued in favour of the appointment of a committee of enquiry, but the Duke said that time would not permit this session, but official enquiry should be instituted in the autumn.

At a public meeting in Galway, a letter was read from the treasury department, saying that the government could not comply with the demand to make Galway a harbour of refuge.

LATEST BY TELEGRAPH.

London, Wednesday.—The Daily News' city article says funds opened on Tuesday with increased firmness at a fresh advance of one eighth. The article in the Monitour, taking exception to the military and naval expenditure of England, then became known, and a fall of one quarter occurred in Consols; from this there was no recovery and closing quotations were one eighth below those of Monday. In all other markets a tendency to improvement was shown in the morning, followed by dullness in the afternoon. The demand for money continues steady, and leading discount houses are disinclined to take the best bills below 2½ per cent. £195,000 in gold has been withdrawn from the bank since the last returns.

The Times' city article says that after various minor fluctuations, Consols closed at a decline of a quarter.

The article in the Moniteur exercised a depressing effect. The continuance of the slight drain of gold from the bank which had set in was likewise against the market.

Money was in good supply, and demand for silver rather slackened.

A report of France being ready to disarm had but limited influence, the belief being that the army would not tolerate such a step on an extensive scale.

A Paris telegram, dated Tuesday evening, to the London Post, says Sardinia has named as her plenipotentiary at Zurich M. Des Ambrois, a very enlightened man. It is expected he will visit Paris before proceeding to his destination. Austria, however, refuses to meet any Sardinian representative, but will leave it open to Sardinia to accede to the treaty after it shall have been concluded between Austria and France.

The Grand Duke of Tuscany has expressed his willingness to abdicate in favor of his son, who promises a constitution, but the Tuscans object altogether to the dynasty.

The Herald has the best authority for stating that the Grand Duke Constantine will soon visit England.

The Times says another large French loan will be wanted before long. The same journal replies to the Moniteur's article on the armaments of the two countries. It says that its statements in many respects are deceptive.

The Times strongly urges the immediate arming of the navy with Armstrong guns, and increased exposition in the manufacture of guns by private contracts.

VERY LATEST.

Liverpool, Wednesday.—The North American arrived at 8 o'clock this morning.

France.

It is said that the Emperor will make his public entry into Paris on Sunday, August 14th, at the head of part of the Army of Italy. The troops will halt on the following day for the usual fete Napoleon.

After the 19th, the Emperor proceeds with the Empress to the Pyrenees.

The Duke de Malakoff has been appointed Grand Chancellor of the Legion of Honour.

The Emperor has granted a pension of 3,000 francs from his private purse to the brother of Gen. Auger, who was killed in Italy. It was reported that 200,000 men were to be discharged from the army on a reasonable furlough, so that the government will have them still on hand, while their cost can be diminished to other purposes.

The Paris flour and wheat market was firm, owing to the reports that the wheat crops would be less than was anticipated. The provincial corn markets were also firm, and advancing. Accounts from the wine regions were unfavourable; the grapes had been injured by the excessive heat, and prices were tending upwards. Brandies were quiet.

The Moniteur de Lafiotte, a government organ, says that Denmark has ceded the Island of St. Thomas to the United States.

Count Pourt, the Prussian ambassador, had arrived at Paris.

The fetes had been animated and brilliant on the 20th ult., while in the Moniteur on the manifestoes caused a sensation, and prices declined one-eighth; rentes closed flat at sixty-seven-sixty.

The Sardinia Le Nord says that each of the first acts of the new Sardinian ministry will be to put an end to the present dictatorship; to convoke the chambers; and propose a constitutional bill applicable to Lombardy. A declaration will afterwards take place, in order to effect in the new Chamber a reconciliation of Piedmont and Lombardy. The King will preside, and Parliament sit, alternate years at Turin and Milan.

Italy.

In regard to Garibaldi's position, it is said that he was appointed to command, on the 15th ultimo by General Dalle Mormora, with whom he had a long confidential interview—that he had a force of fifteen thousand men, which continued to increase—and that he expressed confidence in the King of Sardinia not favouring the national cause. A letter dated Milan, 20th says that Garibaldi has constructed a road from the Alps to the Apennines—from Northern to Central Italy. There will be a gathering of about fifty thousand volunteers in Bologna. Garibaldi's corps, formed by that of Montanara, will form an advanced guard of twenty-five thousand men, and will be followed by the main body of the army. The Austrians will be given battle in the neighborhood of Mantua.

It was rumoured that the Duke of Modena proposes to urge 4,000 Austrian troops to enable him to enter his State; also that a division of the French army will enter Parma and Tuscany, and another corps the Roman legation, for the purpose simply of preserving order and allowing the free expression of public opinion.

The municipality of Florence formally expressed a desire for annexation to an Italian kingdom under Victor Emmanuel, or that Tuscany should be governed by a prince of the House of Savoy, in case annexation should be impossible.

Rome.

The Pontifical Government had issued a circular to its representatives abroad, complaining that the refusal of the dictatorship of the Roman legation by the King of Sardinia was completely illusory. The nomination of the Marquis Dazeglio was considered of as a flagrant violation of neutrality. Other acts of usurpation against the legitimate authority of the Pope was also quoted. The circular says that they provoked in the Holy Father much indignation seeing that such enormities proceed from the government of a Catholic King, who had accepted the advice of his agust ally in refusing the dictatorship offered him.—His holiness desired that this protest be communicated to all the European Powers, and trusts they will co-operate in vindicating his rights, for which purpose he invokes their assistance and protection.

Baron Hembar, formerly the Austrian ambassador at Paris, had arrived at Rome to replace Count Colledo as Austrian ambassador at Rome. A great number of addresses were signed against the return of the ex-minister government, and in favour of a union with Sardinia. The country had resolved upon keeping up public order, and of repulsing every attack of the Swiss troops in the service of the Pope; also, that regular voting should take place, expressing the wishes of the country.

Letters from Rome assert that the principles of the Italian Confederation had been accepted by the Pope. A majority of Cardinals in Conference voted in favor of the Pope accepting the Presidency.

The French ambassador had an extraordinary audience of the Pope of two hours' duration.

In the Times' city article it is stated there was a recovery at Mark Lane yesterday, July 20th, of 1s. The News says the advance was 1s. to 1s. 1d. The Herald reports wheat market firmer; but an advance of 1s a 2s per quarter over rates of Monday, the 18th inst.

Liverpool Markets, July 27—Corn—The weather during the early part of the day was changeable, with occasional heavy rain, but since Sunday it has been fine.—There was a better enquiry for wheat on Friday, at 1d to 2d per cental improvement, and since then the market has been quiet. In other articles there has been no material change. At our market yesterday there was a fair enquiry for wheat, and prices closed 2d to 3d per cental dearer.—Oats were about as before. Barley and beans were firm. Peas maintained their value. The best descriptions of flour were more saleable, but inferior sorts were dull as before. Flour per 280 lbs—Western Canal 21s to 23s; Philadelphia and Baltimore 22s to 24s; Canada 24s to 26s, extra qualities 26s to 28s. Wheat, English white 9s 9d to 10s; American white 10s 8d to 11s 6d; Canadian white 9s 9d to 10s 6d; red 8s 9d to 9s 3d.

Life Assurance.—The subject of Life Assurance has lately occupied a great deal of the Public attention, and any remarks at this time of the day, upon the actual system, are scarcely necessary, as that work has been fully done—by means of prospectuses and papers, which have been industriously circulated and strewn upon our paths. But since competition has become so great, we begin to look into the different advantages offered by competing companies. The question is now—"Where can we assure a sum of money to be paid to widows or families, not only at the cheapest rate but with the greatest certainty that the contract or bargain will be carried out not actually as to the letter of the law, but to the spirit."

A case has recently occurred here, in which we consider we only do our duty in making public. Mr. Alex. Bryson, of this City, assured his life in 1851, with the Colonial Life Assurance Company, and paid his premiums regularly up to last November, at which time he neglected to take up his receipts although informed of the fact of its lying in the Agents hands, consequently, the policy, by reason of the non-payment of the premium, was void. Mr. Bryson died on the 31st of March last, and the company at once stepped forward and informed the parties interested, that in accordance with the resolutions recently passed by the Board of Directors, at the head office in Edinburgh their claim to the sum assured, £500, was good, as also to a Bonus of £40.

We quote the portion of the Resolution refered to:

"that Policies of five years duration, effected for the whole term of life at a uniform rate of interest, [this does not include Survivorship Assurances, Joint Lives and Survivorship Assurances on which any portion of the Premiums may be allowed to remain unpaid as a debt on the Policy], shall not be forfeited in consequence of non-payment of any ordinary premium until the expiry of thirteen months from the regular date when the premium fell due; but after the expiry of the first thirty days from the date when the premium fell due [generally termed the Days of Grace,] the Directors shall not receive payment, of any such arrear except with a fine of five per cent. per month on the premiums in arrear; and should the person assured have died within the period of thirteen months, before the renewal of the risk, the claim shall still be binding on the Company, subject to deduction of the premiums unpaid, and fines if incurred. At the expiry of such period of thirteen months, reckoning, not from the end of the Days of Grace, but from the regular date when the premium fell due, the Policy shall be entirely forfeited, and the Directors shall calculate the value of such Assurance according to their usual practice, and carry the same to a "Forfeited Policy Account" to the credit of the persons who were interested in the Assurance so forfeited, to remain there till the end of five years from the regular date when the premium fell due which was not paid. But if no claim shall be made and substantiated for such calculated value within the said period of five years, the same shall be carried into the general funds of the Company, for their own use. No evidence of health to be required in connection with these resumed."

This will go a long way towards doing away with the feeling entertained by many that [illegible] to get quit of their [illegible] at any time [illegible] to them, reasonably that if not the case, as the Colonial holds out every inducement to their policy-holders to keep up all the Assurances.—Dispatch Dundee.

How the News of Peace was Received in Italy.

By the Ocean Queen, the New York Commercial Advertiser has received advices from its correspondent at Brescia, from which we make the following extracts:

The news of the peace and the terms upon which it had been concluded fell upon Italy with the force of a thunderbolt. People naturally looked aghast, and when within the first hour of the arrival of the news in Milan I heard repeated a thousand times, "Oh! it's impossible! it's simply impossible! Napoleon who has espoused our cause so nobly, is not going to leave us in such a position!" When there was no longer any doubt of the news, men sank down in despair and disappointment. They had the look of men who had suddenly lost all that was dear to them in this world, and gazed at the ground vacantly as if trying to penetrate the great depth of grief that had fallen upon them. Others gave vent to their feelings in violent passion, and heaped terrible anathemas upon such a peace, avoiding to mention the name of Napoleon, out of respect to his brave wounded officers, who fill the streets of the city. There were men who went up and down the streets raving, and striking their fists upon the tables of the cafes like mad men. The French officers were apparently as astonished as anybody, and avowed their inability to comprehend it. And well they might, for without explanation the thing was entirely incomprehensible.

Matters remained thus the first day.—The King came to town that day on his way home to Turin, and was rather coldly received by the people. Napoleon had heard by telegraph of the feelings excited in Milan by the peace and delayed his arrival here. In the meantime he issued a proclamation to his soldiers in which he gave them to understand that he had been forced to make peace by imperious and unexpected circumstances. This seemed to modify the acrimony of the people to some extent, and when he arrived yesterday he had a troublesome reception—about such as he receives every day when he travels about the streets of Paris, but not such a one as the conqueror of the freedom of a people is permitted to expect. The King went to meet him at the station and the two made the entry seated side by side in a carriage. An immense proportion of the citizens remained away from the line of procession designedly while another portion who were present made a distinction between the Emperor and his army, and remaining silent while the Emperor and King passed, cheering vehemently the generals of the suite, and the soldiers who formed the escort. The army at least were conquerors, if their commander was not.

The Emperor and King remained in Milan over night and left together the next day, for their homes. At their departure they were better received by the people than on their entrance, no doubt, because a reaction based on the proclamation of the Emperor had set in.

The organization of the Province of Lombardy as an integral portion of the kingdom of Sardinia will commence immediately. There is a large party in favor of a strike for independence, with a republic or a King, the capital at Milan. But this will not be permitted. The province now is under the direction of a Governor appointed by Victor Emmanuel, and the newly organized National Guard do civil, police, and military duties. As regards Lombardy its organisation is an affair which the congress will have nothing to do with since Austria has renounced all right to it, and it belongs totally and entirely at this moment to Sardinia by right of conquest. With it came, as I understand, the two important fortifications of Mantua and Peschiera, which have already been evacuated by the Austrians, and for the moment are occupied by the French, who in turn will soon pass them over to the Sardinians.

The feature of the peace which makes the future gloomy to the Lombards is that the Confederation, chained under the influence of Austria and the Pope, will be forever unable to offer to Sardinia any assistance in case of another war with Austria, while Sardinia, even with the addition of Lombardy, will not be strong enough to engage alone in a war with Austria. The enmity between the two races is now so vital and deep-rooted that they have no hope in remaining as good terms with Austria, unless upon the condition that they are strong enough to make themselves respected; and this condition can only be accomplished by completing the first programme of the war, which was to unite to Sardinia, besides Lombardy and Venetia, Duchies of Central Italy. This would give a total population of something like eighteen millions, and with such a population, a just cause and the sympathy of France, they would have no fear. As it is, however, they look for nothing but war and disaster.

The army is rapidly passing through here on its way back to France. The movement commenced two days ago, and since the superior officers precede their commands leaving to their inferiors the direction of the travelling arrangements, Milan begins already to look deserted.

Balzac's Habits of Composition.

Day by day and week by week, his note-book and his brains were hard at work together, before he thought of sitting down to his desk to begin. When he had finally arranged this materials in this laborious manner, the at-last scattered to his study; and from that time till his book had gone to press society saw him no more. His house door was now closed to everybody, except the publisher and the printer; and his costume was changed to a loose white robe, of the sort which is worn by the Dominican monks. This singular writing dress was fastened round the waist by a chain of Venetian gold, to which hung little pliers and scissors of the same precious metal. White Turkish trousers, and red morocco slippers, embroidered with gold, covered his legs and feet. On the day when he sat down to his desk, the light of heaven was shut out, and he worked by the light of candles in superb silver sconces. Even letters were not allowed to reach him. They were all thrown, as they came, into a japan vase, and not opened, no matter how important they might be, till his work was all over. His time to begin writing at two in the morning, stimulated with extraordinary rapidity, till six; then took his bath, and stepped in it thinking, for an hour or more. At eight o'clock his dejeuner brought him a cup of coffee. Before this his publisher was admitted to carry away what he had done. From that till noon he wrote on again, always at the top of his speed. At noon he breakfasted on eggs, with a glass of water and a second cup of coffee. From one o'clock to six he returned to work. At six he dined lightly, only allowing himself one glass of wine—Bruce wards to eight he received his publisher again; and at eight o'clock he went to bed. Thus life he led while he was writing the Medici, the two Diablos together, without intermission. Its effects on his health was such that, when he appeared once more among his own friends, he looked, in the popular phrase, like his own ghost. Chance acquaintances would hardly have known him again. It must not be supposed that this life of resolute exclusion and fierce hard toil ended with the completion of the first draught of his manuscript. At the point where, in the instances of most men, the serious part of the work would have come to an end, it had only begun for Balzac. In spite of all the preliminary studying and thinking, when his pen had scrambled its way straight through to the end of the book, the leaves were all turned back again, and the first manuscript was altered into a second with inconceivable patience and care. Innumerable corrections and interlinings, to begin with, led in the end to transpositions and expansions which metamorphosed the entire work. With all this mass of alteration in every page, the manuscript was at last ready for the printer.—Even to the sharp experienced eyes in the printing-office, it was now all but eligible. The deciphering it, and setting it up in a moderately correct form, cost an amount of patience and pains which wearied out all the best men in the office, one after another before the first series of proofs could be submitted to the authors eye. When these were at last complete, they were sent in on large slips, and the indefatigable Balzac immediately set to work to rewrite the whole book for the third time. He now covered with fresh corrections, fresh alterations, fresh expansions of this passage, and fresh abridgments of that, not only the margins of the proofs all round, but even the little intervals of white space between the paragraphs. Lines crossing each other in indescribable confusion were supposed to show the bewildered printer the various places at which the multitude of new insertions were to be slipped in. Illegible as Balzac's original manuscripts were, his corrected proofs were more hopelessly puzzling still. The picked men of the office, to whom alone they could be intrusted, shuddered at the very name of Balzac, and relieved each other at intervals of an hour beyond which time no one printer could be got to continue at work on the universally execrated and universally unintelligible proofs.—All the Year Round.

Melancholy Accident and Strange Coincidence.

It is with regret we have to record the accidental death of a most respectable farmer, residing in the Whitelays, named Joshua Coogan, who was killed on last Saturday evening, when riding home from Drogheda. The unfortunate gentleman came into town on the morning of his death, and, having transacted his business, he left on horseback in the evening in perfect health and melancholy to relate, as he was in the act of crossing on horseback the Brathan rivulet, near Claremount, a short distance from his own residence, the animal stumbled and the poor gentleman was thrown off on his head, and killed on the spot. What makes death of Mr. Coogan so remarkable is, that his grandfather was killed at the very same spot where he lost his life, in a similar manner, having been thrown from his horse; his mother met her death at the same place, under precisely similar circumstances; and on two previous occasions the deceased was thrown from his horse, when crossing the rivulet at the same spot.—Drogheda Argus.

The Great Guns of France and England.

WHICH ARE THE MOST DESTRUCTIVE?

Marseilles Correspondence of the London Times

The most noticeable feature in the arsenal in the effort made to prepare rifled ordnance for the navy. Twelve thirty-pounders have just arrived, and were waiting to be fitted with locks, preparatory to being sent to the fleet. The system which appears to be definitely adopted, after repeated experiments, consists of three grooves, about three inches broad and the eight of an inch in depth, with a twist of one sixth.—More guns of the same kind are being landed on the quays. From the exertions made to provide French men-of-war with a certain number of rifled guns, the question naturally suggests itself whether it is prudent for English ships to wait until they can be supplied with Armstrong guns. The increased superiority of rifled ordnance may be accepted now as an established fact.—Yet so enormous is the demand that for the protection of English interests I believe many years must elapse before Armstrong guns can be applied to all our ships land batteries. After the terrible lesson of Solferino, no English force should be allowed to go into action on such unequal terms as the Austrians did. Under these circumstances, therefore, and while waiting the supply of the necessary number of Armstrong guns, it would seem to be no more than a wise precaution to rifle all the smooth bored guns of small calibre as far as possible. It will be a long time, I apprehend, before the 68 pounders (solid shot) are superseded, but there is no reason why the lighter guns, 32 and 24 pounders, now supplied to ships, should not be rifled. There are I believe, an immense number of the latter calibres in store in England, and they have the reputation of being remarkably steady, easy to work and requiring few men. If they were rifled they would throw cylindro-conical solid shot and shell, the former weighing at least fifty pounds. By using guns of such light weight, but throwing such heavy metal, the number of 56-pounders supplied to each ship might be increased without fear of over-weighing her, and there can be no doubt as to the superior effect of a broadside, of shot each weighing fifty pounds or sixty-eight pounds, and ranging 8,500 yards, as compared with the result of the present armaments. With the mechanical resources of England, there is no reason why every smooth bore of the calibre mentioned should not be rifled within the next three months. The same observation applies with greater force to the brass guns of the field and horse artillery.

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

The By-law Enslemens!

SIR,—Peterborough is becoming famous, if meetings can make it so. First we have a meeting of "so called business men" where the people are fairly represented. At the meeting a motion condemnatory of the By-Law, as injurious to the operation to the interests of the Town, was proposed and carried, and a deputation appointed to wait on the Council, to urge them to amend the [illegible] to Messrs. White, Lundy, & Co., till the Railway is successfully dispatched that the By-law is decidedly unpopular. Accordingly to themselves the tools of "the people" a requisition for an other meeting is got up. This document is signed by the supervisory and a few of their personal friends, and two days are spent by the people so called in getting their friends to attend and vote in their favour. Demosthenes of the Examiner came forward at the meeting, and in a characteristic speech in which unqualified impudence of statement, abuse of his opponents, and a want of candour and truth, in about equal percentages, form the component parts, cleverly evades the merits of the question; and attempt to pass off a few logical falsities as correct reasoning. Of the other speakers in favour of the By-law, responsible for their statements, I shall say nothing. If their speeches were evasive, and inconclusive, I must do them the justice to say that they were not abusive.

In spite of the extraordinary exertions of the illustrious trio it is very doubtful whether they had even a numerical majority at the meeting. The chairman confessed his doubts, though he decided in the affirmative. But one thing is certain they had not a majority of the rate-payers present. Nor do I believe that, so long as the By-law remains as it is, they could by any possibility, get such a majority.

But let us come to the merits of the question. What is the cause of all this "tempest in a teapot." The truth is simply this that three or four persons having property in the immediate vicinity of the market place think that if they can compel people to go to their neighbourhood to buy, and sell, they will be especially benefitted. They argue (amongst themselves) that if the producers are to go to market and sell there that they will naturally rush to the nearest stores to spend money obtained by the produce. For this selfish purpose, and for this only, the By-law was introduced, and is now so strenuously supported. That this is the case its supporters cannot honestly deny. Indeed the reputed father of the By-law, who has now publicly owned the paternity, made a qualified admission of the fact. But these three or four gentlemen—the so-called people—would have defeated their purpose, had they honestly stated their true motives, and, through their unscrupulous mouthpiece they therefore had resource to trickery and deception. A new-born zeal for the interests of the people, both in town and country was ostentatiously paraded; the former by some miraculous operation of the By-law was promised better prices for his produce if he would only go to their neighborhood to sell, while the purchaser at the same time was told that he could also purchase cheaper if he would only go there to buy. How this miracle was to be performed the public have hitherto been uninformed. But as Mr. White, jr., has made the discovery that the better meeting the buyer face to face at the Market gets a better price than when he happens to meet that same buyer face to face on the street, outside the By-law hallowed precincts, I expect we shall have a lucid explanation of the phenomen in the next Review; his explanation on Saturday night was a wretched failure. On a certain day in February last, when wheat was understood not to fall under the By-law, 5s 10d a bushel was paid. Several farmers on hearing of that price came to Town to sell on the day following when, lo! the buyers had agreed to reduce the price and it was then only 5s 1d.—What an injustice, exclaims the Review, Had wheat come under the By-law the buyers could not have acted so, and why? Because some American buyers might in that event have come into the market.—Was not this a wretched attempt at trickery. Will the Review dare to maintain that American or other foreign buyers care one whit whether we have a market By-law or not? Or that it will bring, or keep away a single one. His argument here was merely in keeping with his other fallacies of the evening, and I leave it to the public to judge whether there could be anything like honesty of purpose where it is necessary to resort to such devices. Mr. Clinton, in a few words, converted into rags the web of sophistary, and conclusively showed what were the true motives by which these three or four gentlemen were actuated; and that having already, in a manner, helped themselves considerably to town property, for the benefit of the Town professedly, but for their own benefit really, they are even now desirous of conferring another similar benefit on the Town, by taxing the county people for the special benefit of the property they had thus obtained; and more especially with the view of filling their own pockets. That they had sacrificed the town property they did not attempt to deny. Mr. Burnham in confessing his sins, evaded the real charge by stating that if it was a sin to have been partly instrumental in obtaining six or seven hundred dollars a year to the Town he admitted the iniquity. But he did not deny, and could not honestly deny, that the property so disposed of was worth more than double the six or seven hundred dollars obtained for it. Yet these are the men who, for their own selfish interests, are resolved if they can, to uphold a by-law which is prejudicial to the interests of the town. Their policy is short-sighted. Already, we believe they have been disappointed in the results expected, and thirst after a new Town Hall to make up for the short-comings of the By-law. If they are disappointed already they will be more so by and bye. The farmers have discovered long ago that the By-law is a failure; that it simply imposes a fine upon them, full confers no benefit; and that, in its operation, it presses infinitely heavier on the poor man than on the rich. Mr. White says that the large farmers sell by sample, and evade the law; but admits that those who have only a load, or a few bushels to sell bring the grain to town, in bulk, and are saddled with the market tolls. I appeal to the farming community whether there is even the shadow of justice in this. These men who, if we take their own words, have the poor man's interest so much at heart, tax him, while they allow his wealthier neighbour to go Scot-free. The latter might kick against the pricks: they therefore paint out to him how he may evade the law, the poor man they think has no friends; they therefore hit him hard. Is this not enough of itself to condemn the law? But there is even a worse feature in its operation. By the system of forming out the tolls the market Clerk is necessarily driven to act as a spy, and this perhaps in the most irritating, and exasperating effect of the By-law. That very class of people to whom a town owes its prosperity—those living in the country around—when they venture into town with their produce, whatever it may be, are watched from the moment they pass the corporation limits as if they were suspected characters, and under police surveillance. They cannot but feel it; they do feel it, and frequently are have heard those who for years past have sold and bought in the town express their determination not to come back again to encounter similar annoyance. Other towns, they say, are equally near to [illegible], where they can sell and buy as advantageously as here; and where they will not be hunted like felons, and imposed upon peculiarly as they are here. Last only of our so-called business men, with exception of the Irishman, whether they do not almost daily hear such unwelcome expressions. The so-called business men are naturally sorry to see their old customers thus harassed; and the feeling is not by any means confined to [illegible] but is shared by nearly all [illegible] with whom, and will ultimately, when perhaps too late, be shared by them too.

The country people are now pretty well aware that to the sheep or [illegible] themselves already referred to, they are indebted for all the annoyance they have met with in disposing of their produce in town of late. Let them keep this in remembrance, and act when time and opportunity shall serve in a manner to convince the co-partnery aforesaid that they know and remember it, and that such utter selfishness shall not pass with impunity.

I was about to conclude, Mr. Editor, without adverting to Mr. White's twaddle about wool. It was another silly piece of clap-trap and scarcely worth notice. It was simply ridiculous to attribute to the By-law the high prices obtained for wool last season. His friend Veritas when lecturing on political economy, should have told him that prices are regulated by the relative proportions of supply and demand? Does Mr. White really believe that his pet Bye-law created the demand? I think not: and all his fine theory about the wool market dissolves into air like the other baseless fabrics of his brain, palmed off upon the public on Saturday last. Messrs. W. L., & Co., are trying a fleecing business, and we are not surprised that they should have attempted to make something out of the wool trade. But in this, as in his other arguments the wits of our Shakespearian "pump of oratory" were a woolgathering in vain.

Yours truly,
Vox Populi.

THE FOLLIES OF DANDYISM AND ITS RESULTS.

A "dandy" is a beast superb,
Of antic form and curious garb,
Now common every where.
A beast? Yes! start not at the name,
An ass and "dandy" mean the same
Within my native shire.

For "dandies" now-a-days you know
Are dressed like monkies for a show,
Poor empty butterflies;
They flit away on gilded wings
Till spider Death entraps the things,
L—d knows he gets a prize.

A certain song-writer tells us "there is no place like home," and the song is right. But how many homes there are to be found where fashion reigns predominant, or how many homes there are which are no homes. It is enough to make one sick to think of it—not one home in ten deserving of the name. But why should we wonder, let us look at it: I mean the manner of obtaining a home.

A young "dandy" meets a "pretty face" in a ball room, falls in love with it, courts it, marries it, goes to house-keeping with it, and boasts of having a wife and a home to go to. The chances are nine to ten he has got neither. The pretty face gets to be an old story, or becomes faded, or freckled, or fretted, and as the "pretty face" was all he wanted, all he bargained for, all he swore to love, honor and protect, he gets sick of his bargain, knows a dozen faces which he likes better; gives up staying at home on an evening, consoles himself with cigars, oysters, whiskey punch and the Leader, hurls anathemas at Geo. Brown & Co., and looks upon his home as a very indifferent boarding house. A family of children grow up around him, but neither he nor his pretty face know anything about training them, so they come up helter-skelter—made toys of when babies, dolls when boys and girls, and when they get to be young men and women they conduct themselves as if "the chief end" of their existence was amusement and frivolity.

Another becomes enamored of a "fortune." He wheedles it to parties, dances with it, exchanges letters with it, pops the question to it, gets "yes" from it, takes it to the parsons, weds it and calls it wife; carries it home and sets up an establishment with it, introduces it to his friends and says he has got married, and has got a home. It's a lie. He has no home, and he soon finds this out. He is in the wrong box, but it is too late to attempt to get out of it; he might as well hope to escape from his coffin. Friends congratulate him, and he has to grin and bear it. They praise the house, the cradle, the new Bible, and the baby, and then bids the "fortune" and him who husbands it, good morning.

Another case:—A young woman is smitten with a pair of whiskers and white shoes. Curled hair never before had such charms. She "sets her cap" for them; they take the bait. The delighted pair of whiskers and white shoes make an offer, first one then the other proffering themselves in exchange for her "own" heart. Miss is overcome with magnanimity, closes the bargain, carries home her prize, shows it to pa and ma, calls herself engaged to it, thinks them extraordinary such a pair of whiskers before, and the consequence is they are married. Married! yes the world calls it so, but what is the result? A short honey-moon and then the unlucky discovery that they are unlike as chalk and cheese, and not to be made one, though all the "priests" in Christendom pronounced them so.

These all result in unhappy homes.—What else can be expected? Young folks now-a-days get their ideas of life's holiest relations from the novel, or when this is not the case, they in most instances have no idea at all of it but are governed in their choice and conduct by their feelings, passions and imaginary interest.

ALBANY LUMBER MARKET.

August 8.

There is some improvement in the lumber trade. The demand is not confined to any single locality, but is scattered throughout the northern States. Some pine has been bought up for Virginia, but nothing further south. The receipts during the month of July have been quite large, footing up 67,163,562 feet of boards and scantling against 35,928,167 during the corresponding month of last year. These figures show an excess of over eleven millions of feet, and they are corroborated by the appearance of the yards in this district. The yards are all fully stocked, and the business during the month having been moderate, the receipts have greatly exceeded the shipments. The consumption of pine grows and hemlock is good, while hardwoods can be found more plenty and the assortment greatly improved. Shipments during the past week have been moderate and freight unchanged.

A. CATHCART,
Market Clerk.

Died.

In New York, on the 5th ultimo, Rev. Francis C. Woodworth, aged 46 years.

[Mr. Woodworth was born in Colchester, Conn., in 1813. In his youth he learned the painter's trade, and during the time he was pursuing his studies, supported himself by laboring as a journeyman, and writing for the press. He graduated at the Union Theological Seminary in New York, in 1839. He was settled as a minister in Fair Haven, Vt., and South Norwalk, Conn., both of which places he was forced to leave, as well as to abandon the ministry altogether, on account of his health. Returning to New York, he was connected with the Christian Parlor Magazine and the National Preacher as editor, and contributor with several other papers and periodicals. In 1846 he established, in connection with his brother, D. A. Woodworth, the Youth's Cabinet and Uncle Frank's Dollar Magazine, now consolidated with Merry's Museum, of which he continued one of the editors. His literary labors have been mostly devoted to writing for children, for whose amusement and instruction he had a most happy faculty, and as "Uncle Frank" he had become known and loved by thousands of children everywhere, who will mourn his death as that of a near and dear friend.—Life Illustrated.

THE MOST SPLENDID EXHIBITION

Ever offered to the Public

AT PETERBOROUGH,

TUESDAY, AUGUST 16th,

Among the overpowering attractions is the Great Pentland Circus, are the unique talent performance of the superb stock of PERFOR

Agricultural.

The Hon. M. L. Dunlop has an improved mode of planting and cultivating the potato. He ploughed his land eight inches deep last fall. This Spring, when ready to plant, plowed again, shallow furrows, dropping the seed in every third furrow—a single cutting in a place fifteen inches apart. The fourth furrow of course covers the seed. As soon as the tops show above ground harrow the land thoroughly; then go through with the cultivator, and twice with a shovel plow, being careful to do all this work before the potato plants blow. The hill should not be disturbed afterwards. Mr. Dunlop informs us that he has grown them in this manner at a cost of eight cents a bushel.

A correspondent of the New England Farmer says buckwheat grown on a soil infested with wire-worms will entirely exterminate them.

The blind staggers is cured by slitting the forehead just between the eyes, two or three inches in length to the skull bone.—The same remedy may be applied to sheep.

At Sessey Corner farm, in Stithians, England, a dairy cow, partly Jersey and partly North Devon, has dropped 4 calves within the last 12 months, the whole of which are doing well.

According to the York (England) Herald a cow belonging to Mr. Dunn, farmer, of Kelfield Lodge, near Selby, had one of her forelegs broken on Martinmas day last, by the kick of a horse. The beast was attended by a person from Riccall up to March last, when Mr. Dunn applied to Mr. Shaw the veterinary surgeon of Stillingwood, who said that nothing short of amputation could effect a cure. Mr. Shaw operated on the 4th of March, she calved a fine calf a week before, and brought it up, as well as two lambs; and now that the animal possesses the advantages of a wooden leg, she has been turned out to grass, and makes a wonderful shift for herself.

Some curious experiments have been made at the Veterinary school at Alfort (just outside Paris) by order of the minister of war, to ascertain the endurance of horses, as in a besieged Town, for example: It appears that a horse will live on water alone five and twenty days; seventeen days without eating or drinking; only five days if fed but unwatered; ten days if fed and insufficiently watered. A horse kept without water for three days drank 104 pounds of water in three minutes. It was found, too, that a horse taken after being fed and kept in the active service of the "squadron school," completely digested its "food" in three hours; in the same time at the "conscript's school," its food was two third's digested; and if kept perfectly quiet in the stable digestion was scarcely commenced in three hours.

MANURES—Lime, bones, or guano, can seldom be used with advantage in this country, on account of their expense, with the exception of lime, which may in some localities, where it can be procured cheap, and at a short distance from the farm, be used with profit.—Agriculturist.

PHONOGRAPHY, OR WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six; So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. BENTON, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ☞ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

TO BE ENLARGED!

A NEW VOLUME—NEW SERIES,

TO COMMENCE ON JULY 2d, 1859.

Instead of 416 pages, the yearly volume, Enlarged Series, will contain eight hundred and thirty-two pages of valuable reading matter, useful and instructive to all classes.

THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN is published weekly in quarto form, suitable for binding, and the numbers for a single year contains information in regard to new inventions, Machinery, all branches of Manufacturing processes, Agricultural Implements, Engineering, Millwrighting, Iron Manufacture, chemistry; in fact, almost every industrial pursuit receives more or less attention in its columns.

All Patent claims officially published every week, as reported from the Patent Office; and for

INVENTORS AND PATENTEES

It contains information not to be obtained elsewhere, and which no mechanic, inventor or patentee can well do without.

As a Family Journal it has no superior for real practical utility, since in its columns will be found useful practical receipes.

Careful attention will be given, from time to time, to reports of the Metal, Lumber and other Markets.

Every number will contain sixteen pages and forty-eight columns of matter, with several illustrations of patented machines and other engravings, comprising in a single year about

SIX HUNDRED ORIGINAL ENGRAVINGS.

With the Enlarged Series is presented an opportunity to subscribe not likely to occur again for many years. It will be like commencing a new work—Vol. I, No, 1, new Series

Send in your subscriptions without delay, as to begin the new volume—July 2 next.

Terms $2 a Year—$1 for Six Months.

Southern, Western and Canadian money or Post Office stamps taken at par for subscriptions. Canadian subscribers will please to remit twenty-six cents extra on each year's subscription, to pre-pay postage.

Selected Poetry.

Let us Help One Another.

Let us help one another,
And a heart of kindness show,
As down time's flowing river
In the boat of life we row.
For though rough may be the weather
And the sky be overcast,
If we only pull together
We can brave the storm at last.

Let us help one another
In misfortune's wintry day,
And be kinder still, as ever
Earth's best gifts are snatched away.
When bright fortune gilds the morrow,
Hollow hearts will fawn and cling;
But when comes the night of sorrow,
Only true hearts comfort bring.

Let us help one another,
And do good where'er we can,
Who withholds the hand of kindness
Scarce deserve the name of man:
For the one great law of nature,
Which was meant mankind to bless,
Bids us help a fellow creature
When we find him in distress.

To my Mother.

Though fortune may banish
And friendship decay,
Like snow 'neath the sunbeam
That melts it away;
There's one that is steadfast
Through sorrow or joy,
Who's love old time's footsteps
Can never destroy.

'Tis the love of a mother,
Oh! guard it with care;
A gem that is priceless,
More dazzling and fair
Than snow at its purest
When winter winds blow;
More precious than riches
That labors bestow.

Though age may encircle
Her tresses with white,
That voice keeps its sweetness,
That eye is still bright;
And I'll love her forever
Whate'er may betide,
As I did when in boyhood
I played by her side

The Queen of the Arena.

It was a strange scene. The waggon was close to the circus, formed indeed part of it—the poor woman was laying on the low shelf, called the bed of the travelling caravan; two or three of the wives of the men attached to the exhibition were around her, endeavouring by their exertions to relieve momentarily increasing pain, and helping her to bear it patiently by their sympathy.

"He ought to have been here half-an-hour ago," said one of the women. "Jim started for him on the piebald two hours since!"

"Did he take the piebald?" said another "Why I thought he was in the Italian Lovers?"

"No, he wouldn't run with the spotted mare, so they have put the blind grey with her, and took the piebald in the quadrille for Dick Gravel to take bottom couple with."

The explanation seemed satisfactorily for silence ensued.

Presently a roar of such laughter as is only heard in a circus at a country village—fresh, genuine, hearty—shook the sides of the frail vehicle.

"What's that?" said the apparently dying woman.

"Only your Bill's Quaker story," said one.

"Oh then he'll soon be here, won't he?" said she.

"Yes, he's only got three more points, and then he'll come; he don't go in the Sylph scene."

Three fainter peals of laughter told that the three points had hit, but not as well as the Quaker story; and then he came in.

"Well," said he "how is she now?" in a voice whose anxiety contrasted most strangely with his tawdy dress, that of tumbling clown at a travelling circus. "How is she now?"

"I'm better, Bill," said the woman.—"Can you stop a little?"

"Yes; I don't go in next, it's Chapman's turn;" and so saying the man seated himself by the side of the woman.

She was still young and as far as the dim light hung from the roof would enable a judgment to be formed, good-looking; the cork-grimed eyebrows, cracked lips and dry cheeks, told that she too had appeared before the public for its amusement: indeed the traces of rouge were still on parts of the face, and told too truly that she had lain there but a short time only since last evening's performance; indeed, when, during one of her jumps through the hoop, a man putting on his hat startled the horse, and so caused a false step, which brought her heavily to the ground. The experienced ring-master saw she could scarcely stand and handed her out, kissing her hand in the usual style, and few, if any of the spectators knew that when rapturously applauding the most unparalleled feat, the leap from the horse's back through the hoop to the ground their applause was unheard by their intended object. She had fainted immediately on reaching the dressing-room, and was at once carried to the moving chamber where she now lay.

But to return. She took his hand in hers, saying; "Bill, I don't think I shall go round any more."

"Don't say so, lass, it'll be all right when the doctor comes."

"No, Bill; I feel better, but something tells me, I've put on the togs for the last time."

"No, lass, no!" was all the utterance he could find. "Don't say so!"

After a pause she said: "Bill you recollect that London chap with the French name, that came down to the Doncaster races?"

"O, yes, I know," said the man, half angrily, as if wishing to avoid the subject.

"Well, you know you said that time that you thought there was something between me and him."

"Well, I know it," said the man, "but don't think of that now; don't trouble yourself about that."

"But I must, Bill. I think I'm dying Bill dear and I shall like you to think of me when I'm gone, as I am truly, Bill."

The man made no answer.

"Bill," said the woman, with increasing vehemence of manner, "do you believe I'd tell you a lie now?"

No answer still.

"Bill! Do you think I'd tell you a lie now?" said she as though her life depended on his answer.

"No, no, lass," said he at last, "I don't think you'd tell a lie any time—but now—" and he hesitated.

"Where's Jenny?" interrupted the woman."

"Here," said one of the youngest women standing up, so that she might be seen, "What do you want?"

"Jenny, you'll find the key of the green trunk in the china mug with 'Nelly' on it. I wish you'd look in the box, and get me my old Bible out."

The girl found the key, and asked where the box was.

"O dear, I forgot, it's under me," said the woman.

"There, never mind," said he, "I dont want any fuss about it."

"O, Bill, dear, I wish you'd lift me up a little, and pull it out. You can put the broken chair under to keep me up then."

"No, never mind." said he, "it'll pain you so."

"O, Bill, dear, I don't mind, I wish you would."

He did at last; and after some trouble and a few suppressed groans the box was pulled out to the middle of the floor, and there wrapped up in paper and neatly hid, was the Bible; the paper greasy, from contact with disused head-dresses, garlands, bands, and other small accessories of the dress of the Queen of the Arena. They gave it to the woman, who soon asked, "Where's Mary?"

"O, she is here now," said one of the women; and a girl about five came running in: she had only been performing the part of a little fairy in the just finished scene; her wand was still in her hand, and the gauze-wings on her shoulders; she took them off laid down the silvered stick, and came to the bed.

"Mary, dear, are you there?"

"Yes, mother, I'm just done, and the people clapped so when Julia took me on her shoulder."

"Put her on the box, she can't see her," suggested some one; it was pushed to where the child stood, and then the mother said:

"Mary, I'm going away."

"O, mother where to?"

"But before I go, I want you to see me and father friends again." The child started with wonder; but the woman not heeding her, continued; "Bill, dear, have you got the paper off the Bible? Well, open it at the New Testament."

"Here one of you women find it. Jenny will you?" said the man.

Jenny did it, and gave it back.

"Now, Bill, raise me up a little.

"O, never mind," said he, "I know you'll get hurt."

She only looked a repetition of her request; and then taken the open book from his hands, said: "Bill, dear, you know you said there was something wrong between that London chap and me. I told you at the time there was not, and you did not believe me, though you didn't say so; and you don't believe it now," she said, with increased energy. "Now, Bill hear me swear that, as I believe, I'm a dying woman, there was nothing between us, and this child's your own, as much as Mary, there is." She kissed the book, and said "Do you believe me now."

"Yes, yes," said the man, "I do, I do!" as though some spell over him had broken. "I do, Nell, I do! O, Nell! what a fool I've been, and what a coward not to believe it before! O, Nell! forgive me, forgive me, I've done you wrong!"

The woman raised herself by a great effort, to reach his hand and kissing it, said: "I do Bill. I knew you'd do me justice some day."

"O, Nell, it's not to late—not too late. You'll get better, and we'll be as happy as we were before this."

The woman only drew his head to her, and kissed him; while he, roused, kissed her again and again, "You do believe me don't you, dear?"

"O forgive me, Nell! O, forgive me!" were the only words he could find in the rush of his newly found trust.

"Bill's wanted," shouted some one at the door. "Old Whip's called you three times."

"Here's the white, Bill," said Jenny," you want touching;" and she brought it, and stood with the lamp, while he pointed out the trace of tears on his cheeks in front of a broken looking glass.

"The red will do Bill; go on or you'll have him in here, and she won't like that.

Bill went on, and the doctor arrived a few minutes afterwards. He was a short, stout good-humored looking man, with a brisk way of speaking, that at once secured obedience.

"Now then," said he, "what's amiss? I could make nothing of that fellow you sent after me. Ah!" said he, altering his tone as his eyes, growing used to the light, took in the woman's face on the bed.

"What do they call you" turning to the youngest of the assembled women.

"Jenny, Sir."

"Will you stop. All the rest go.

The women grumbingly obeyed, and he stooped down to examine his patient.

"When did this happen, Jenny?

"Last night, Sir."

"Why didn't you send before?"

"We did send to one here in the village but he wouldn't come, because she belonged to the circus. He sent her this" handing him a paper.

"Umph!" 'The World and its Amusements on the Broad Way.' Just like that sentimondous Jennings. Sends the woman a tract, and lets her suffer all day long."

"Doctor," said the sick woman, "how long can I live?"

"Live, woman! why you are good for another forty years yet."

"No, Doctor, I'm not—I feel I'm not long for this world."

"Oh! all nonsense I must be," you'll get over this." And with like comforting assurance be sought to raise her from her depressed condition. In about ten minutes he went to the door and said, "Come in here one of you, while I go to the gig." He soon came back and the woman remained with him.

In a little while the clown came up to the group of women outside the door, and leaning in all attitudes against the sides and steps of the waggon.

"Well, has he come?"

"Yes, he has been in this quarter of an hour."

"What does he say?"

"Oh! she'll do,' he says, didn't he?" said one of them, turning to another for confirmation.

He soon left, and his voice was heard shouting some old witticism of the ring as though there were no such things as sick wives and doctors in the world. In a few minutes more he came again quite out of breath from the last somersault, the approbation of which was still heard. Seeing the door partly open he entered, and his face looked joyous, as the wail of a child greeted him.

"Which is it? A boy?"

"Yes," said Jenny.

The answer was unheard by him, for there—stretched out in death—was the mother. Contrary to the doctor's expectation, the accident and premature delivery had caused her death.

Yes! There she lay; the hollow sunken eyes—made unnaturally bright by the traces of rouge upon her cheeks—the jaw fallen. Death was evidently there, and he saw it. She with whom he had hoped to share all the cares and joys of life; now that the only difference they had ever had was removed. She was dead! The man seemed stunned. A strange pair they looked;—he in the motley and paint of his calling; she—dead!

"Bear up, Bill," said Jenny approaching him with the child; "it's a boy, Bill; and she wanted it to be called after you."

The man seemed not to hear, but, walking up to the bed, and taking one of the dead hands in his, kissed it gently, as though afraid of waking her; and then, as though his loss had just been realized, muttered, "Dead! dead!" and lay down, his face close to hers, kissing the fast cooling lips with frantic earnestness.

"Dead—dead—dead!" still came between his choking sobs. To him the women, moving to and fro in offices about the child, were not; to him, useless was the doctor's farewell. "Dead—dead—dead!" and the heaving chest and bursting eyeballs found relief in tears.

"There, don't talk on so, Bill," said one, trying to raise him; 'don't take on so hard, Bill!"

She might as well have spoken to the box on which he half sat, half leaned, as he hung over his dead wife. They then tried to get to close the staring eyes; but a look which appalled them shook their nerves too much to allow of a second trial. A noise outside attracted them to the door.

"What's the matter now?"

"Matter enough!" said a harsh grating voice. Here's Chapman so drunk he can't go in, and Bill's skulking because his wife's sick; there never was a fellow in the ring worse treated than I am."

"She is dead, Whips," said one, pointing with her thumb back to the waggon.

"Dead!" said he.

"Yes; and he's there too."

"Well, if that ain't too bad," said he; "here's the last scene before the quadrille, and no clown—it'll ruin the circus. The second night, too; for last nights jump has filled the place—there ain't standing room—and they have been calling for her all the evening. Dead," said he again, as though his loss were caused by her neglect.—"Who'd have thought it? What's to be done?"

"Can't you make Chapman do?"

"No, he's a fool any time to Bill, and now he's drunk he's no use at all. What's to be done. I don't know."

Here he was obliged to leave, for the uproar in the circus was deafening. "Clown Clown! was the only cry they would make. In vain did Whips drive the horses faster and faster till the "Corsican Brothers" were nearly in a horizontal position with their speed; nothing would appease the now excited people.

Whips came out again. 'Where's Bill?' said he.

"Here, Bill," said Jenny, "Whips wants you."

"Who wants me?" said the man.

"Here, Bill, I do," said the voice at the door.

Jenny gave the child to one of the women, took him by the arm, and led him to the door.

"Bill," said Whips, "here's Chapman as drunk as a beast, and the people crying out for you like mad. Can't you go?"

"Go!" said he pointing to the body. "How can I go? No, I can't go."

"Well, Bill, you must; it's only the second night, here's the queen away and no clown."

"Well, there's only the Indian warrior to go in," said Bill.

"Well, I know that, but what's the good of him without somebody to give him his things? What's the good of my giving him his club and bow, or the paddle either? No, Bill, you must go; it won't do to send in any one else now, they'd pull the place down."

Here another and louder cry reached them. "There now" said Whips, "that's it; there's the 'Corsican Brothers' has been going around this quarter of an hour, till they're sick of it, and the grey'll be so lame to-morrow she won't stir a peg. It's no use, Bill, you must go.'

"I can't Whips; it'll be no use if I do."

"Oh, yes, you will; you must go, or it'll have to throw up the agreement, and you know you've overdrawn your money this last two weeks."

"Well, I know it," said the man, evidently now irresolute at this threat.

"Well, then, go in if its only five minutes. Here, take a drink of this, it will give you heart."

The man took the proffered flask and drank deeply.

"Well," said Whips, "you'll go, Bill, won't you?"

"Oh, yes, I'll go," said the man; go on.'

They left the waggon, and the repeated round of applause showed that the public was satisfied. The clown was never more witty, never more agile. Somersault after somersault, leap after leap was taken with a recklessness that nothing could equal; again the encores of the elite, and the bravos of the vulgar, spurred his exertions. At last it ended, and the quadrille came on.—The clown left the ring, with the plaudits ringing in his ears, and came to the waggon to find—Alas! What?

At the conclusion of the quadrille those in the waggon heard a cry.

"What is it?" said the man, now in his old position, close to the body, with her hand locked in his, and his eyes fixed on her face.

"They're calling for her," said Jenny pointing to the form in the bed.

There was a lull, and then a long thunder of clapping hands and stamping feet, which rose and died away.

"What's that for?" asked the woman holding the child of a person entering.

"Oh! they called for the queen and old Whips made a speech, and said she was rather unwell and could not appear, but would most likely be better to-morrow, she would again perform her celebrated feat of leaping through the hoop to the ground."

"Well, my dears," said the doctor, at the supper table, to his children, "how did you like it?"

"Oh! we didn't see the queen, father,"

"No?"

"No, not at all; the man in the ring said she was not well, but would be there to-morrow, and the clown was a good father, in the scene with the savage."

"Was he, my dear. Do you know why you didn't see the queen?"

"No."

"Well then, I'll tell you. Because she was dead That clown was her husband. I left him kissing her dead lips, and I dare say he is there now. It's a strange world this! Such a sight as that I never saw before, and hope never to see again."—Once a Week.

The Importance of Sleep.

About one-third of the life of man is spent in sleep. He who lives to reach the age of three score years and ten, will have spent more than twenty years of this period in unconscious repose. This simple fact alone is sufficient to proclaim the overwhelming importance of sound, refreshing sleep to health, happiness and longevity of man.

The origin of much of the nervousness and impaired health of the individuals who are not decidedly sick, is owing to a want of sufficient and quiet sleep. To procure this should be the study of every one. It is to be feared that the great praise of early rising has had this bad effect—to make some believe that sleep was of but little consequence.

We have heretofore stated that in our opinion the most frequent and immediate cause of insanity and one of the most important to guard against, is the want of sleep. Indeed, so rarely do we see a recent case of insanity that is not preceded by want of sleep, that it is regarded as almost a sure precursor of mental derangement.

Notwithstanding strong hereditary predisposition, ill-health, loss of kindred and property, insanity really rarely results unless the exciting causes are such as to produce a loss of sleep. A mother loses her only child, the merchant his fortune—the politician, the scholar, the enthusiast, may have their minds powerfully excited and disturbed; yet, if they sleep well they will not become insane. No advice is so good therefore, to those who have recovered from an attack, or to those who are in delicate health, as that of securing, by all means, sound regular and refreshing sleep. It is true that some few persons are able to perform much mental labor, and to study late at night, and yet sleep well. Some require but little sleep. But such individuals are very rare. Gen. Pichegru informed Sir Gilbert Blane that during a whole year's campaign he did not sleep more than one hour in twenty-four. Sleep seemed to be at the command of Napoleon, as he could sleep and awake apparently at will.

M. Guizot, Minister for France under Louis Philippe, is a good sleeper. A late writer observes that his faculty for going to sleep after extreme excitement and mental exertion is peculiar, and it is fortunate for him that he is so constituted, otherwise his health would materially suffer. A Minister in France ought not to be a nervous man; it is fatal to him if he is. After the most boisterous and tumultuous sittings at the Chambers, after being baited by the opposition in the most savage manner—there is no milder expression for their violence—he arrived home, threw himself upon a couch, and sank immediately into a profound sleep, from which he was undisturbed till midnight, when proofs of the Moniteur were brought to him for inspection.

Friendship.

The shortcomings (observes the sage) of the uniformly just and faithful should readily be pardoned. An evil associate seeks occasion to cavil, and disdains apology. There is some utility in friendship, save in that of simple-minded. The following three things are due to our friends: our undivided attention when they enter our house; our welcome when they sit therein; and our car when they speak. The reducer is brother to the murderer, and silence the sister of compliance. My son, said the sage, never exchange an old friend for a new one, while the heart of the first remains true to thee; dress one country not indifferent, nor a thousand friends unacquainted. The friendless man is as the left hand without a right. He may be termed a true friend who never misleads thee, who promotes thine advantage to his own detriment, and who is anxious to deliver thee from oppression. It was asked of the wise man, whom he loved most, his brother or his friend? to which he replied, I never love a brother unless he is my friend. Two things are calculated to retain the unmixed esteem of our friends—to anticipate them in our salutations, and to show them due respect in society. There are three degrees of folly: To censure actions from which we are not exempt; to discover faults in others which we are prone to overlook in ourselves; and to solicit a useless favor.—Hebrew Proverbs.

Losses in Great Battles.

The Military Gazette of Vienna makes the following comparisons of the forces engaged in the battle of Solferino and in former battles: "At the late battle there were more than 300,000 soldiers in the field and the losses must have amounted to at least 30,000 or 37,000. At the battle of Leipsic, which lasted for three days, the 330,000 Allies had against them 260,000 French; the latter lost 30,000 prisoners and 45,000 killed and wounded, and the former, 48,000 killed and wounded. After Leipsic, the most sanguinary battle was that of Moscow, on the 7th of September, 1812. The Russians had 130,000 men and 600 pieces of cannon, the French 134,000 men and 597 cannon, the losses were therefore, 40 per cent. At Bautzen, on the 21st of May, 1812, there were 110,000 Russians and Prussians opposed to 150,000 French; the latter lost 20,000 men and the allies 15,000, and not a single cannon. At Wagram, on the 5th and 6th of July, 1809 we had 137,000 men, and Napoleon 170,000; we lost 20,000 men and the enemy 22,000. At Esling we were 75,000 against 85,000; we had 20,000 killed and wounded, the enemy 13,000 killed; but he left in our hands 3,000 prisoners, and was obliged to send 30,000 to Vienna to have their wounds attended to, so that out of the 160,000 men engaged about one-half were put hors de combat. At Austerlitz there were 70,000 French, as many Russians, and 13,000 Austrians; the losses were 21,000 Russians, with 160 pieces of cannon, 5,800 Austrians and 10,000 French. At Jena there were, 142,000 French against 150,000 Prussians. At Waterloo there were 170,000 men, of whom 70,000 were French, who lost 25,000 men and 250 cannon, whilst the allies lost 31,000 men. On an average the losses in all these battles amounted to from 20 to 25 per cent. whilst in the late battle they did not exceed 15 per cent.

A Pandemonium.

The people of Rome have long contracted some very bad habits. They frequent taverns and wineshops, and they quarrel over their liquor; the word and the blow of other people is with them the word and the knife. The rural population are as bad as the townspeople. Quarrels between neighbors and relatives are submitted to the abjudication of cold steel. Of course they would do better to go before the nearest magistrate; but justice is slow in the States of the Church; lawsuits cost money, and bribery is the order of the day; the judges are either fools or knaves. So out with the knife; its decisions are swift and sure. Giacomo is down; 'tis clear he was in the wrong. Nicolo is unmolested; he must have been in the right. This little drama is performed more than three times a day in the Papal States, as is proved by the Government statistics of 1853. It is a great misfortune for the country, and a serious danger for Europe. The school of the knife, founded at Rome, establishes branches in foreign lands. We have seen the holiest interests of civilization placed under the knife, and all the honoured people in the world, the Pope himself shuddered at the sight. It would cost his holiness very little trouble to snatch the knife from the hands of his subjects. We don't ask him to begin over again the education of his people, which would take time, or even to increase the attraction of civil justice, so as to substitute litigants for assassins. All we require of him is that he should allow criminal justice to dispose of some few of the worst characters who throng to these evil haunts. But this very natural remedy would be utterly repugnant to his notions. The tavern assassin is seldom a foe to the Government.—The Roman Question.

Wonders of the Microscope.

The following narrations are from the 'Microscopist's Companion," by John King, D. D., and illustrate the practical value of the microscope.

One summer's eve, in 1837, a savage murder was committed on the edge of one of the forests in Normandy, France. A laborer, returning from his daily labors was stricken down by the hand of an assassin, and, from the nature of the wound inflicted, it was concluded that the deadly blow had been inflicted with a hatchet. Another individual had been seen on the same eve, and about the hour of the commission of the dark deed, near to the scene of the murder. Suspicion fell upon him; he was arrested, imprisoned, and in due course, tried. As witness appeared after witness, their evidence brought the foul deed more and more closely home to the accused; and when it was at length proved that, upon the man's cottage being searched, on the very night after the murder, a hatchet with some stains of blood, and with some hairs upon it, had been found in an out-house, the murmur went round the Court that the evidence was complete. The Counsel regarded the conviction as certain; the Judge seemed ready to pronounce his doom, and the unhappy accused felt that he was lost. But in God's good Providence one man was there who had clearly watched the progress of the trial, and who by no means concurred in the almost unanimous opinion of the guilt of the panel. It was M. Orfila, the distinguished toxicologist. He asked leave from the Judge to examine the hatchet; and to such a man as Orfila his request was not refused. On subjecting the blood and the hairs to the scrutiny of the microscope, Orfila ascertained that the hairs were the hairs of a deer, and the blood that of the same animal, which the accused had said he had found wounded, and had killed with his hatchet as he returned from his daily toils. Orfila communicated the result of his microscopic trial; a thrilling sensation ran through the audience; the counsel were confounded; the Judge felt himself constrained at the eleventh hour, to find that the charge was not proved to the satisfaction of all, for the real murderer was thereafter discovered, acknowledged his guilt and was executed.

A few years ago, a girl nine years of age, was found lying dead, her throat cut, in a plantation in Norfolk, England. Suspicion fell upon the poor girl's mother, who had been seen by several persons to lead her child to that plantation on the day on which the murder was committed. But the accused coolly and confidently maintained her innocence, admitted that she had been with the murdered girl near the spot where she had perished,—but declared that the girl had wandered from her side in quest of flowers; and that after long in vain searching after her, she—the mother—had left her child in the wood, where her dead body was afterward found. No evidence could at first be discovered to support the early suspicion that the mother was a murderess. A long and sharp knife was indeed found upon her, but, after a keen scrutiny, nothing particularly was observed about it, except that there were on the handle a few hairs, so very small as to be scarcely visible. "Here is a hair on the handle of your knife," was the remark made to the suspected mother in whose presence the examination was conducted. "Yes, very likely," was the immediate and composed reply; "and perhaps there is blood on it too, for so I returned from the wood I found a rabbit in a snare, and cut its throat with a knife." The knife was despatched to London for microscopic examination. It was there found that it had been washed. After very minute examination, it was found that a fluid had penetrated between the horn handle and the steel lining. It was blood, but certainly not the blood of a rabbit—rather, apparently the blood of a human being. After examining the hairs on the handle the microscopist, who had intentionally been kept from all knowledge of the special facts of the case, unhesitating declared that they were the hairs of a squirrel. This was a damning fact for the wretched mother; for a tippet hung around the poor child's neck on the day of the murder; over that tippet the weapon which did the cruel deed must have passed; and that tippet was of squirrel's hair. On the trial the jury deemed this one fact, in connection with the circumstantial evidence, so conclusive as to warrant them in finding the accused guilty; and before the day of execution, the mother-murderess confessed her crime.

In the summer of 1855, a large sum of gold belonging to the Russian Government was forwarded, packed in a box, along one of the railroad lines in Prussia. On the arrival of the box at its destination, it was found that the gold had been abstracted, and a quantity of sand substituted in its room. The national police detectives were immediately set to work, but all their efforts, backed by all the wealth and appliances of the government, failed to lead to any discovery. At first it was supposed that the sand might show at what station the robbery had been effected; but there was sand at one station, and sand at another, and sand at all the stations along the railroad line, and so the trace seemed lost. But it was shrewdly suggested that the sand in the box should be submitted to the microscope; and when so examined, this sand was found to contain a peculiar organization. Specimens of sand were then brought from all railroad stations. On being examined, it was found that only the sand of one station contained the peculiar organism discovered in the sand of the box. At this station, then, the robbery must have been committed.—The clew thus given was followed up; and so the microscope brought to light the little organism discovered in the sand, so that little organism brought to light the parties who had placed the sand in that box, and committed the robbery.

Melancholy Occurrence.

On Wednesday, a lady travelling on the Great Western Railroad, was taken unwell when within a short distance of London. On the arrival of the train at the London station, a gentleman fearing that the lady was unable to proceed upon her journey, called in the aid of a medical gentleman, who pronounced the unfortunate lady in the last stages of consumption, and gave his opinion that she could not survive over a few hours. His statement, alas, was too true. The lady, by the kind instructions of the station master, and Dr. Brown, was conveyed to the hospital, where she lingered until six o'clock in the evening, and then expired. Accompanying the mother was a bright and interesting little lad of two years, and an infant of six weeks old, both of whom will be taken care of until word is received from the friends of deceased.—The man, however, is in such a delicate state, that it is impossible he can live another day. The deceased it appears was on her way to Biddeford, near Boston, on a visit to some friends, or, perhaps for the benefit of her health. She had purchased a through ticket [dated 11th June] from LaCrosse, Wisconsin, where her husband resides, to the place mentioned, and was on her journey thither, when overtaken by the grim hand of death, and left to perish in a strange land, far from the home of friends and relations; still, every want that the deceased required, was carefully furnished by the gentlemen in charge of the hospital.—From papers found in the possession of the deceased, it appears that her name is Brockett, and her friends have been notified of the melancholy event that has just transpired. The funeral of the deceased took place on Friday, and her remains were followed to their final resting place, the cemetery, by several gentlemen who had taken an interest in the case of the unfortunate lady.

FARMING IN CANADA.

From the British American Journal.

Some time ago, in noticing Mr. Caird's little book on prairie farming in Illinois, we took occasion to object to the writer's disparaging remarks with reference to Canada. Mr. Caird hurried through the Province by way of the Grand Trunk and Great Western Railroads, and forming his judgment from what he saw from the carriage windows he pronounced an opinion against Canada as compared with Illinois, with all the air of a British agriculturalist, and one who is recognized not without justice, as an authority in such matters. We have no doubt that James Caird is a "prodigious clever little fellow," as one of his neighbours described him to a brother editor in Scotland. None but a fellow of prodigious cleverness and assurance to match, could form an opinion and publish it, on the agricultural resources, the advantages and disadvantages, of a province hundreds of miles in extent, which he traversed in the space of two or three days. But the truth is that this flying view of Canada was merely introduced as a foil to his more careful and much more favourable account of a district of country in which he happened to be interested. Mr. Caird in a letter to a Canadian paper, published the other day, has denied the statement that he holds shares in the Illinois Central Railroad. This is a mere quibble that is unworthy of the writer. Mr. Caird does not deny that he was sent out from England on a mission by the shareholders of that Company, and perhaps he will not dispute that he is now employed in London as agent for the sale of that land the value of which his late publication has done so much to promote. We see a statement to this effect, at least, copied from an Irish paper, which gives it apparently without any unfavourable motive towards Mr. Caird, or any reference to his partiality as a witness on the value of American lands. Another circumstance mentioned in the same journal is that which occasions our present reference to this subject, namely, that Mr. Caird's representations are having the effect of directing the attention of British emigrants from the woods of Canada to the prairies of Illinois.

Mr. Caird's comparison of the two districts, or, more properly speaking, his representations of Illinois by implication rather than direct assertion, as greatly superior to Canada, has been very intelligently disputed by Mr. Hutton of the Bureau of Agriculture in Canada in a communication on the subject which he has addressed to the newspapers. As Mr. Hutton points out, Mr. Caird, in his journey by railway, had no opportunity of forming any correct idea of Canada as a farming country. Judging from what he saw, he talks of the country between Peacot and Cobourg being only partially cleared. "The train" he says, "shoots for many miles together through the primeval forest a path having been cut in the woods for the railway track, and the felled trees and branches still lying where thrown on either side of the line." Mr. Caird had only to diverge for half a mile to either side of the railway track to find himself in a country altogether different from that which he indicates in this sentence. What he saw was only the rear of well cleared cultivated farms, the bush which on every farm, is preserved for the sake of the timber. Within a rifle shot of the line which he thus describes, we have ourselves recently seen some of the finest farms in America, without a stump in the ground, with handsome steadings in many cases, and with crops which only want a higher style of farming to be equal to anything in the Lothians of Scotland, and superior to anything in the neighborhood of Baldoon.—The district which Mr. Caird supposes to be in such a general state of nature has a population, as stated by Mr. Hutton, of 240,000. Had Mr. Caird taken a drive of twenty miles through the country, at almost every point on this part of his journey, but more especially above Kingston, he would have been entirely undeceived, and both as to the agricultural resources of the country and the condition of the inhabitants, we would have formed an estimate which could not possibly have suffered by comparison with anything in the Western States, but quite the opposite. Around the Bay of Quinte and in Prince Edward County he would have seen a district which, for beauty and richness, is well-named "the Garden of Canada." And when he learned that farms in this district, entirely cleared with good fences and comfortable buildings, can be purchased at from thirty to forty dollars an acre, and that the country is in all respects healthy, with good markets in the neighbourhood for every kind of produce and daily communication in all directions, both of land and water, he would have had some information even more fitted to tempt the old country farmer than those rich agricultural prospects which he found in Illinois, with the drawback of fever and ague.

M. Hutton also deals very conclusively with those absurd notions which Mr. Caird was led to form from this literally "bird's eye view" of the more western section of the Province, particularly the fertile districts between Hamilton and Paris. As regards Canada generally, Mr. Hutton maintains that it offers great inducements to the settler than the prairie country. He points out that Mr. Caird has overlooked, that the timber which has to be cleared from the Canadian soil before it can be cultivated has a value of its own for buildings, for fences, for firewood, and for making potash, while pine trees, he states, are worth from 6s. to 15s. each. Then, as regards the agricultural produce, he says: "Which gives the largest crops of wheat per acre of the best quality? Decidedly Canada West. According to the United States census of 1850-51, Illinois did not yield ten bushels per acre, whereas the average of all Canada West that year was 16, 14-60, and of the counties to which Mr. Caird alludes in the above extract [between Hamilton and Paris] the average was 21 bushels. Then as to the quality of Wheat, that of Central Illinois is notoriously inferior. Merchants in Toronto import large quantities of it at about half the price of Canada wheat for distillery purposes, not being fit for making flour, or as it what is denominated by the Americans 'Stump-tail flour,' being of a third or fourth rate quality, and this is the general character of the prairie wheat in Central Illinois. Then as to price, Mr. Caird quotes it at 8s sterling [75 cents.] At the very time Mr Caird quotes this as being the price in the Illinois markets, Canada wheat was selling in Toronto and Hamilton and all our frontier markets, at exactly double that amount 6s sterling [$1.50], and at this date Upper Canada wheat is selling in our markets at double the price of Illinois wheat in Illinois markets."

Meeting Mr. Caird on his favorite ground o' figures, Mr. Hutton gives a balance sheet showing the Canadian farmer of 100 acres in a better position at the end of two years than the farmer in Illinois. We do not place much reliance on figures of this sort; but certainly the fact is generally understood in Canada that newly cleared land will in an average year yield a wheat crop the first season sufficient to defray the price of the land and cost of clearing, even where the former is as high as $10 an acre. But clearances are generally effected on a very small scale, not by capitalists, but by humble settlers bringing merely their own labor to the task. Farmers who have money always prefer to buy cleared land, and with a knowledge of their business they rarely fail to succeed. The great drawback in Canada, as in other parts of the Continent, is indifferent farming, the chief cause of which is the low price of land. The average yield of wheat is only about seventeen bushels an acre, but a good farmer can raise from thirty to forty bushels without difficulty, and it is believed that on the best soils with thorough high farming persevered in for a series of years, the yield could be raised to between fifty and sixty bushels.—The difficulty is to make farmers believe this, so as to induce them to expend capital in draining and manuring, at a cost per acre which is greater perhaps than that of the land itself in a cleared state. Yet there are exceptional cases in which high farming is believed in, and we ourselves lately saw a farm which, purchased two or three years ago for thirty dollars an acre, was bearing crops this season that for luxuriance and fine condition could scarcely be surpassed on the richest carse-land in Scotland where the small farmer in some cases pays as much per annum for the land as the owner in this case paid in the shape of purchase money! This was the result of high farming, and of any experiment only recently commenced. The wheat would be equal to about forty bushels an acre at the price of a dollar and a half a bushel, would yield exactly double the cost price of the cleared land, buildings included. With further perseverance the same land will probably yield ten bushels an acre more. This was in an old section of the country, which settlers would do well not to overlook. The constant tendency westward is a mistake. In some parts of Lower Canada, we are informed, on the authority of a competent observer, that good wheat-bearing land, with buildings, and near the best markets, can be had for $10 an acre. In the hands of the present these lands have fallen very low in point of productiveness, in the same way and for the same reason as a part of Canada West, where the old Dutch settlers are said to empty their manure into the river, in order to get rid of it. With good farming, and especially in connection with the feeding of stock, an intelligent farmer will make money as fast in Lower Canada as in any part of the West, and with far more certainty and comfort, free from those speculative manias which mislead men, and those crisis which carry away the fruits of their industry. The same remark holds with reference to the eastern provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island. From personal observation, we can aver that there is a good deal of delusion and misery involved in the constant cry of "Westward, ho!" For real comfort, for health, for substantial prosperity, for the opportunity of making a start in the world with the smallest means, commend us to those overlooked regions of the north-east that extend from Cape Breton to Lake Ontario.

MR. BRIGHT ON PEACE AND WAR.

When I read of peace being concluded, I felt as if I could breathe more freely, since the species to which I belong was no longer engaged in the fiend-like destruction of its fellow-creatures. [Hear, hear.] What do we now find in the manifesto of the Emperor of the French just received. He says he discovered—I am not now using his exact words—that he was making war against the minds of Europe. This is a most important and valuable admission, and I only wish the Emperor had found this out three or six months ago. [Hear.] He says, further, that the war was assuming dimensions which were not consistent with the interests of France. I am surprised that a man reputed to be so acute did not perceive that he would be exposed to this great danger before he entered upon the war. But the two admissions made in this remarkable and memorable address prove to me that the suspicions which have been so studiously raised in this country as to the future objects of the Emperor of the French are altogether unfounded. I do not believe it possible for either the Emperor of the French or the Emperor of Austria to have returned home with all those scenes of horror flitting before their eyes, and I hope before their consciences, and to be now prepared to enter into a struggle—least of all a struggle with a nation like ours, containing 30,000,000 of united people, the most powerful, the richest, and all things considered, perhaps the best satisfied with their Government of any nation on the continent of Europe. [Hear, hear.] Besides this, have they not learnt something from the improvements effect in weapons of warfare, and the increased destructiveness of life of which those weapons are now capable?—They see now how costly war is in money, how destructive in human life. War is not at all the thing it was some years ago. Soldiers used to look down on trades, and machine-making was a despised craft. No stars or garters, no ribbons or baubles bedecked the mechanician and machinist.—But what is war becoming now? It depends not as heretofore on individual bravery, on the power of a man's nerves, the keenness of of his eye or the power of his soul or the strength of his body, if one may so speak; but it is a mere mechanical mode of slaughtering your fellow men. (Hear.) This sort of thing cannot last long. The whole thing will break down by its own weight. Its costliness, its destructiveness, its savagery will break it down; and it remains but for some Government—I pray God it may be ours! to set the great example to Europe of proposing a mutual reduction to armaments. (Cheers.) We have maintained great armaments, not, I sincerely believe, because we wanted to annex or to conquer any territory in Europe, but whenever anything happens in Europe we may negotiate, intervene, advise to do something or other becoming what is called the dignity of this great country. Do not you suppose this is precisely the language of the French Emperor at this moment—"We build great fleets and you build greater fleets? What does France want with great fleets? Precisely that which you have always wanted with yours. And, therefore, without wishing any more than England wishes to make conquests or to annex territory, France wishes to have great influence in Europe because it suits its dignity, and will add to the glory and historical renown of its Emperor." Well, now, that is precisely the position in which we are, and we have no more right to blame the Emperor of the French than he has a right to blame us.—We are both very silly, (laughter) and I hope from what I have heard to-night that at last we are beginning to find that out.

Quite a sensation was created among the retailers of flour in the Toronto market on Saturday, by an order of the Chairman of the Market Committee to weigh all flour offering for sale. One or two bags were found deficient, but no proceedings were taken, as it is necessary to prove the weight bulk of a bag of light weight, in order to procure a conviction.

Railways Again.

The Review makes a pitiful whine in referring last week to our position regarding the two competing lines of railway running to our Town from the front. He hints that we will be a "used-up community" unless our lumber merchants send their freight by the branch; such is our neighbor's logic. Alas for poor human nature—we find that mankind are not individually inclined to sacrifice their personal interests for the good of a community, nor do we expect to arrive at that state of perfection until the Millenium. Our lumber merchants no doubt will carry the old adage into effect, viz., "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." We are not aware that the Corporation of Peterboro' made any arrangements to supply Mr. Fowler with freight when the branch was leased by him; but certainly our contemporary seems to think that it is our duty to do so. On the same principle any grocer who takes a lease of a store in Town might suppose it was his landlord's business to obtain customers for him. Mr. Fowler leased our railway in the face of no unforseen difficulties, therefore the 'gammon' of an opposition railway doing the business to the detriment of our road is sheer nonsense.—Our contemporary largely observes in reference to the Cobourgers that they wish by "one serious, desperate effort to drive Fowler off the Branch. Every means is resorted to" continues the writer "for that purpose. They know that once the present lessee is got rid of the victory over the Municipality will be an easy one, because it is not in a position to enter the lists with so reckless a rival." What are the inhabitants of Peterboro' and our Railway Directors compared to here? John Fowler the only man, indeed, who can work out our salvation! We believe that our branch will continue to be run over irrespective of Mr. Fowler, and whether or not we cannot be in a much worse position than at present.

We are not sticklers for the Cobourg Railway, but we like to see a spirit of fair play "manifested amongst our community," more especially when we see such gross misrepresentation cast against it by a journal that a short time ago, sounded its praises to the utmost. For example, we are told that 12s 6d was once the tariff price of lumber per M., and now that it is carried at 2s 6d per M. Such is not the case, and well does the Review know it. 9s per M., was the highest price in the best of times! We are informed on the best authority, that the Directors of the Cobourg Road, are willing to make contracts, at the present time, with our lumber merchants and others, for a reasonable term of years, on the same condition as they have made contracts this season.

We like an honest and energetic opposition, and such we have in the gentlemen who control the destiny of the Cobourg road. We have no hesitation in saying that before another season passes Peterboro will have the benefit of direct communication to the back water, by rail to Chemong lake. What a field will then be opened for our enterprising merchants.

The European News.

The news by the Glasgow on Friday last was of a serious and gloomy character, and the prospects of a rupture between France and England sent a shudder through the public mind. By a subsequent arrival we have three days later advices: affairs had assumed a more pacific nature, and it was believed a general disarmament would take place. France, while consenting to a disarmament, holds that it must be understood to comprise the ability to have 56,000 men under arms at a month's notice, and, with a view to the extension of the colonial possessions, a constant developement in the fleet. The army on the Rhine has been dissolved. It was firmly believed in Paris that all ideas of a peace congress had been given up, and that the affairs of Italy will be settled between France, Austria, and Sardinia. Garibaldi has issued a proclamation, in which he says that whatever direction political events may take, Italians ought not, under existing circumstances, either lay down their arms, or feel any discouragement; on the contrary, they ought to enlarge their ranks, and show Europe that they are ready to encounter the vicissitudes of war, whatever complexion they may assume. A declaration, which had been published, was being signed in Romagna, to the effect that those provinces had shaken off the Papal yoke, never to return under it again, and that it is their wish to be annexed to Sardinia. The agitation in Savoy for annexing that province to France is represented as assuming formidable proportions. A Russian journal is authorised, in regard to the story that the neutral Powers offered less favorable terms to Austria than those agreed upon at Villafranca, to state that the basis of mediation of which the project lately published is composed, had not been agreed upon by the neutral Powers, nor even discussed. The preliminaries of peace between the belligerents were already signed before the principles of mediation which formed the object of negotiation between the neutral Powers, was definitely agreed upon. A special correspondent of a London paper writes—Florence, Modena, Parma, Bologna, and Piacenza are arming; they will make a gallant but hopeless defence against their perjured Dukes. They talk already of forming a government of Central Italy; of electing Prince Ploon as Prince President. Be the result ever so frightful, we cannot tamely submit to be enslaved again." The French are now leaving Italy as fast as they can; a small body will be left to assist the restoration of Modena and Tuscany. Leopold II., Grand Duke of Tuscany, has abdicated in favor of his son, Archduke Ferdinand. It has now been decided to dismiss all the Swiss from the Neapolitan service; by the end of December it is said that wine and necessary object will be effected. The English breadstuff markets at the latest advices showed a decline.

TOWN COUNCIL.

MONDAY, August 15, 1859.

Council met. Present—The Mayor, Messrs. Conger, Henthorn, White, Fowlis, Toole, Bradfield, Read, Kennedy, Morrow, Hogan and Burnham.

Petitions from Mr. Jas. Hamilton, Geo. Cunnigham and others were read and referred to Committee on Streets and Bridges.

A communication from Ashburnham Lodge of Good Templars, expressing thanks to the Mayor and Council for having resolved to prohibit the sale of spirits on the streets on the day of the Circus exhibition, was read and ordered to be laid on the table.

The account of Judge Boucher as arbitrator on the claims of the squatters at the south end of the Town was referred to Finance Committee.

An account from McDougall & Co., was referred to Com. on Finance.

The report of the Committee on Finance and Assessment submitted at last meeting was adopted.

The By-law to withdraw the Town of Peterboro' from the jurisdiction of the Council of the United Counties of Peterborough and Victoria was read a third time and passed.

On motion the Commissioners for expenditure of Counties' money on the road from Downer's Corners to the bridge across the river at the Locks were allowed to take gravel off Townsend street, in furtherance of such work, provided the cutting in Townsend street does not reduce that street below the level of George street.

The Treasurer was authorized to pay the balance of the money due for work done at Spaulding's Bay, amounting to £12 10s.

The chairman of the Finance Committee was authorized to raise money for expenditure on public works, by depositing Town debentures as collateral security in the Commercial Bank, if he can make arrangements with the Agent, or otherwise from such other Bank as may be willing to grant it.

The Mayor was instructed to issue a check in favor of James Brown for $20. Also one in favor of Mr. W. B. Read for £33 7s. 7½d, in accordance with report of Committee on Streets and Bridges. Also checks in favor of G. G. Boswell and F. A. Erskine respectively for £7 17s 2½d and £2 0s 3d.

The Streets and Bridges Committee were instructed to cause the culvert recently placed in front of Mr. W. Hall's on Aylmer street, to be covered, so as to allow teams to approach his house.

It was moved and seconded,—That the resignation of Mr. Hogan tendered at a former meeting of this Council be accepted, and Mr. Fowlis be put in his place.—Carried.

The Council then adjourned.

PRESBYTERIAN.—The Temperance Committee of the Free Church has issued a report on Total Abstinence, and recommends that sermons on Temperance be preached in all their churches on the last Sabbath of the present month.

THE CIRCUS—The perfomances of the Joe Pentland troupe were the best of the kind we have witnessed in some time.—Many of the objectionable features of such exhibitions were avoided, and the gentlemanly conduct of the showmen is worthy of notice.

We call the attention of the Temperance Societies in the County, to the Convention of the Total Abstinence Union Association, on Tuesday, 30th inst.

We learn that the grasshoppers are making great havoc in the neighborhood of Rice Lake. One fine field of potatoes of several acres was entirely ruined in about a week, and the little pests are getting more numerous every day.

SUDDEN DEATH.—A man named David Hogan, dropped dead on Saturday, in the store of Mr. Swanston, Ashburnham. Deceased was in apparent good health till the moment of his death.

A St. Thomas paper says that a person named Lenton who had deranged the quarterly password of the Good Templars to a companion, was seized just as he was leaving the room of the Sons of Temperance, by four persons, gagged and muffled, and hurried to a kettle of steel tar which was kept warm in the neighborhood, where he was plentifully supplied with a coat of tar and feathers. Served him right say we.

A GOOD NIGHT'S WORK.—On Tuesday night a trial was made at Ludgate's Mill to ascertain how many feet of lumber could be cut in 12 hours. The work commenced at six in the evening, and at six next morning the pile measured 34,000 feet.—The majority of the lumber cut was in inch boards; some little of it being inch and a quarter. The saws used were a Yankee gang, an English gate and a slabber Mr. Dinsmore, who is foreman for Mr. Ludgate challenges any Mill on the Otonabee river to beat this.—Review. 5th.

We are informed by a gentleman who saw the lumber measured, that Mr. R. Davidson, foreman at Mr. Samuel Dickson's water Mill, sawed between 6 P. M. and 6 A. M. (commencing on the evening of the 11th inst.,) the large quantity of 38,000 feet of inch and a quarter lumber, with one Yankee gang alone. Does that not beat it? Mr. Dickson's mill is the oldest on the river, the frame being in existence upwards of 19 years.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The admission of the Empress to the Council of the State since the return of the Emperor from Italy has occasioned much remark. His Majesty on the first occasion of the Imperial lady's appearance, addressed a few words upon the subject to the Ministers assembled, merely intimating in a playful manner that her Majesty had executed the business entrusted to her during his absence with so much zeal and cleverness that it was but just that she should be allowed to witness the result of her care in the success which has attended every one of the measures executed under her superintendence, and added that it was a delightful thing for a Sovereign to have his Minister of the Interior always at hand. At the Council of State the Empress does not sit side by side with the Emperor but opposite him.

The newly-appointed Minister Plenipotentiary from Austria, Prince Esterhazy, has arrived in Paris. The Embassy is invested with extraordinary splendour; the numbers of savants, secretaries, and attachées far exceed those which have accompanied any former ambassador.

Paris, Sunday.—Not a word of business has been mentioned during the last 24 hours in Paris. We are too full of the fetes of various kinds which are to mark the end of the month. A few days ago, the 15th of August occupied us entirely. The banquet to 70,000 officers and soldiers, the fireworks on Trocadero, the entry of the wounded warriors, are all set aside now for a greater event by far—the transporting of the body of the Great Napoleon, together with that of the Duc de Reichstadt, to St. Denis. Hammer and file are already busily at work in the vaults of the old cathedral, and orders are given to press the undertaking without regard to expense. The tomb at the Invalides, which cost the nation fifteen millions, is to remain there as a monument of the nation's gratitude and generosity; and a mausoleum, combining specimens of every representative of the art of sculpture, is to occupy the place of honor at St. Denis. The idea of transfeging the tombs of the Napoleonic dynasty to St. Denis is entirely owing to the perseverance of old Jerome, who has often been heard to say of late years that Providence would not suffer him to die until he had seen the remains of his brother laid where every Frenchman felt they had a right to repose.

On Monday morning, two trains on the Paris and Lyons Railway, one filled with troops from Italy got into collission. A lieutenant was killed and several soldiers were wounded. The Emperor has ordered an immediate inquiry into the matter.—Another account states that twenty men were killed or wounded.

Princess Clotilda, though a mere girl is just now (says the Globe exercising a very marked influence on the destiny of her native country. She never concealed at the Court here her personal conviction that she was a modern Iphigenia, immolated for state purposes, and she fondly claimed performance of the compact. A kingdom of North Italy, on a large and independent basis, for Victor Emmanuel and the house of Savoy, was the stipulation of her marriage contract; and she talks of returning to her father if the bargain is evaded. Old Jerome Napoleon backs his daughter-in-law, and if sympathy is claimed for the widow of the late worthless Duchino of Parma, some share of the same chivalry is challenged by this child of an ill-fated land.

The Emperor has given all the French officers in Italy double pay for the month of July, by way of compensation for the extraordinary wear and tear of their clothing.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald says that the number of soldiers to be sent home on renewable furlough amounts to 150,000, so that the army will be reduced to about 400,000 men.

The Correspondance Bulier says—"There is still much talk of disarming a part of our fleet, and of sending home from 130,000 to 150,000 men. But if I am rightly informed, the execution of these measures, which so abundantly bear witness to the pacific disposition of the Emperor, will depend upon the march of events and the attitude of foreign powers."

The correspondent of the Times at Marseilles remarks that naval disarmament in France means neither more nor less than the formation of reserves capable of being brought forward at any time, while every sailor paid off in England is lost to the service. If France and England each put out of commission 20 liners, the French ships could be re-manned and ready for sea at a month's notice, but the 20,000 English blue-jackets would have entered the merchant service or the United States navy, and not one-tenth of the number could be obtained for immediate service.

FRANCE AND AUSTRIA.

Vienna, Tuesday.—Prince Richard Metternich leaves to-morrow for Paris, and is bearer of the answer of the Emperor Francis Joseph to the autograph letter of the Emperor Napoleon. The Emperor will receive to-day the Marquis de Bonneville, envoy of the Emperor of the French.

AUSTRIA.

Vienna, July 30.—A Valeggo correspondent assures the Augsburg Gazette that the French army is now well pleased with the turn which things have taken. It has suffered greatly during three weeks from heat, want of good water, and a dearth of provisions, and it has also had time and opportunity to remark that the siege of the fortresses would have been an exceedingly difficult and wearisome task. A person who is generally well informed of what is passing in the military world yesterday told me that for some time past the French army has received supplies from Austria, "the resources of Lombardy and Sardinia being completely exhausted, and it being almost impossible to send a sufficient quantity of provisions for such a large army from France."

ITALY.

All the accounts from the Italian Duchies represent the attitude of the higher, middle, and lower classes as very firm.—They are determined not to restore, the former dynasties.

In Tuscany, the Provincial Government has decided that the representations of the nation shall be double for the constituent assembly, in order that all opinions may be heard, and the ultimate decisions acquire greater authority.

At Modena, the Government has decided that the electoral body shall comprise all citizens above 21 years who are able to read.

At a public banquet in Parma, 2,000 citizens pledged themselves to resist the disposal of their territory of their allegiance without their consent.

THE PAPAL STATES.

Marseilles, August 2.—Advices have been received from Rome to the 31st. The Duke de Garamount has been summoned to Paris in order to confer with the Emperor, and has already been proclaimed a Roman noble by the municipality. Another extraordinary meeting of the cardinals has taken place. A list of New ministers is circulating. Numerous Roman volunteers to the Sardinian army have been authorized to return.

Rome, July 26.—There is great dissatisfaction here. The French soldiers alone keep down a general outbreak. Speculation has been awakened by the following fact:—About three days since M. de Mayneval, Officier d'Ordonnance of the French Emperor, arrived with autograph letters to the Pope and to the Duc de Gramont, but their contents are still kept secret; in all probability they relate to the new order of things. There are some, however, who pretend to interpret their contents in the following sense:—"That it was the wish of the two Emperors to continue their protection to the Holy See, but, as the other powers of Europe would not consent that an armed force should remain in the Papal States, France would be compelled to withdraw her troops. The Papal Government would do well, therefore, to make no delay in satisfying the wishes of honest Liberals." No decision has been come to in the Vatican. The Pope alone, supported by two or three cardinals, expresses a desire as far as possible to satisfy the reasonable demands of the people and of the foreign powers, but the obstinate courtiers prefer the risk of total ruin to any concession which may weaken that despotism which they represent. Between the imperial intimation now communicated to the Pope and the obstinacy of the clergy, you may well conceive what is the position of the honest Liberals in Rome.

The Jesuits have been driven out of Faenza, Forli, and Ferrara. In this last city only one hour was given them; in the other two, twenty-four hours. Inventories of everything in their houses were made and left "per chi di ragione."

A number of gentlemen have presented themselves to the Pope, begging him to form an Urban Guard of select individuals, but their suggestion and offer were rejected.

Queen Christina, before leaving Rome, invested 200,000 scudi in the Roman Consols at 75, thus showing her full confidence in this Government. The Marquis d'Azeglio, who went as commissary from Piedmont to Bologna only declared in his proclamation that he came to collect soldiers. Leaving that city two days after, he appointed a ministry, as though Victor Emmanuel were king and he is plenipotentiary. The "Romagna," united at Bologna continue to govern themselves independently of Rome, and proceed to acts which indicate a perfect separation from the Papal States. It is reported that the miraculous image of the Madonna of St Lucca, having been brought down in procession from the mountain, all the people touching it swore rather to die than return under the power of the priests.

A great number of volunteers who were in Tuscany and the neighborhood, men tolerably well disciplined, have entered Bologna. The Papal troops are concentrated in Pesaro, where Monsignore Bela acts as delegate. These have been prevented by the former from making any advances, and indeed some skirmishes between the outposts have taught the Swiss and Papal troops that they would have greater difficulties to encounter than in Perugia.

THE "TIMES" OFFICE.

You will be interested to hear something of my visit to the Times office. In answer to a written request, I received by post a ticket admitting myself and friend to inspect the offices and machinery. The Times is situated in the centre of one of the most complicated labyrinths of London. Externally it is, like all other establishments of the sort in London, built only to front on dirty, narrow lanes, and so mean and black that it ought not to front on any other. Its interior arrangements, however, seem to be very perfect. At the side of the passage-way by which we entered was a small window, looking out from what seemed to be a porter's room, and within sat an individual in blue uniform, who seemed to fill that responsible position. He took our tickets, and after registering our names in a large volume devoted to the names of visitors, we were met by a very intelligent jolly old gentleman, who proceeded to show us around with the greatest suavity and politeness, taking the utmost pains to explain to the large party of the uninitiated who were with us the sublime processes of putting type into a stick, and taking an impression therefrom. One of the most interesting and novel departments of the establishment is that in which the stereotyping is carried on. You know, perhaps, already, that every number of the Times is printed from stereotype plates, thus saving a great part of the wear and tear of the type. The stereotype plate is taken from the "form" in three minutes, by a new process, invented by a Swiss, and known only to him. A thin layer of soft and damp papier machie first receives the impression of the type, and after it has been hardened by the application of heat, the melted lead is poured on which is to form the stereotype plate. The papier machie has the power of resisting the action of the melted lead, and comes out of the fiery trial uninjured, and almost unscorched. The plates are re-melted every day after the issue of the day has been printed from them, and the waste of type metal from day to day is very slight. By this power of multiplying the number of forms from which the same side of the paper can be printed, the Times can use three or four presses at once, and thus print its 59,000 copies, on an emergency, in two hours' time. The Times employs in its establishment some 350 persons. It has eighteen reporters at the house of Parliament, and for those as well as the majority of its compositors the working hours are the night hours exclusively. It owns four cabs which are employed solely in carrying reporters and reports, at night, to and fro, between Printing House Square and the Palace at Westminster.—The reporters relieve each other at the Houses every quarter hour, though the debate in the Commons last till four o'clock in the morning, the Times gives it in full by sunrise, though it cover two whole pages of the journal.

Ill Treatment of British Subjects in Mexico.

The Mexico correspondent of the New York Times says—Several Englishmen banished from the City of Mexico by the Miramon Government, took passage in the last English steamer from this port. The steamer that leaves to-day carries off Mr. Whitehead another of the banished, and several others have received peremptory notice to leave by the steamer of next month. This seems incredible, nevertheless it is all true. The reason given for these extraordinary proceedings is, that the English signed a certain remonstrance against the savage mode of dealing with English citizens by the Miramon Government, which remonstrance was addressed to the English Minister, Mr. Otway. It is also stated that the banished parties are personally obnoxious to the English minister. Let the case be as it may, that Ambassador is not able to see that driving his countrymen with their families down to the seaboard, through robers and assassins, with the certainty of ill-treatment with the risk of their lives and forcing them at this season to pass through pestilential districts ere they reach their destination, must certainly abound to the discredit of his country and himself. He does not appear to comprehend that this rooting up of his countrymen to the destruction of large interests which have been many years in accumulating, is likely to prove a serious page in the history of his diplomacy. The English Minister either can or cannot prevent these high-handed measures, and his position must be unenviable, whichever horn of the dilemma he is found hanging upon. But it is very well understood that all this has been at the instigation of the English Minister, and the banished parties have no redress, as their own Minister is the author of their destruction, and their own Government supports that Minister.

BAD NEWS FROM VICTORIA.

From the Kingston Times.

Some weeks ago we published the substance of a letter received in this city by a relative of one of the young men who, with a party of his fellow-citizens, started off last Spring for Fraser River. The accounts he gave of Victoria, and what he had heard of returned miners, of the "diggings" were certainly gloomy enough. He mentioned that three of his party, notwithstanding the discouragements, resolved to see Fraser River for themselves. A letter from one of these, Mr. J. B. Phippen, dated at San Francisco the 10th June, confirms the bad accounts of his companion. The would-be miners, with packs on their backs, started off on a journey of 220 miles from Victoria over mountains and rough hills, crossing valleys and streams, until they reached Puget Sound, which occupied them four days and a-half, pretty good speed under the circumstances we think. After procuring tools, at enormous prices, and provisions for a week, ditto, they went to work and after a week's toil the four men realized fourteen dollars worth of gold dust. Disgusted at such a miserable result they sold their tools at half price, and returned to Victoria. Here they tried to procure employment but without success. He says that Mr. Calder was out of employment, that his son "Sandy had nothing to do but dig clams on the shore," that most of the passengers who went out in the same ship had nothing to do and that those who had work were getting 50cts. a-day, others $10, a month, and others only their board. With no prospect but beggary before them, Mr. Phippen, Mr. Alverson and Mr. Goldrick made their way to San Francisco. Here they found no employment, as the city was filled with returned adventurers from Fraser River. They accordingly arranged to leave there for Nappa city on the 11th of June. Mr. Phippen expresses his firm belief "that there is no place like Canada," and has arrived at that conviction by a considerable sacifice of comfort, time and money. He recommends his friends "if they are wise, to stay where they are."

A CANADIAN DROWNED NEAR ROCHESTER.

The Rochester Union states that a man named Charles E. Hubbard was drowned at Charlotte, on Wednesday evening. An inquest was held. When it closed, the Coroner went to Rochester, to find the friends of the unfortunate man, and carry to them the sad intelligence. After a long search he found the solitary family of the deceased—a wife and one child, two years old. The widow was overwhelmed with grief by the announcement, but was not wholly unprepared for the intelligence.—She had wondered at the long absence of her husband, and had a presentment of the worst. She is in destitute circumstances and a stranger there. The Union states that she went there with her husband from Guelph, C. W., last spring, and he had been employed at various avocations since to obtain a support. Deceased has a father at Guelph who is said to be wealthy. Mr. Hubbard was about thirty years old, and a respectable man. The Express has the following additional particulars:—Mr. Hubbard came to Rochester from Guelph, C. W., in April last. He was by trade or profession a nurseryman, and hoped among the extensive establishments of that kind here to obtain employment in some of the higher and better paid branches of the business. In this he was disappointed, and was obliged to accept the work and wages of a common laborer at Ellwanger & Barry's. Finding the labor too much for his strength he left there about a week ago and made an arrangement with Adams & Dabney, booksellers, to sell the "Cottage Testament," and other religious books by subscription. On Wednesday evening Mr. Hubbard went down to Charlotte, promising to return home on Thursday evening. He succeeded in procuring several orders for his books during the day and at dusk went into a small tavern kept by a woman, and engaged lodgings for the night. He left his satchel in the care of the woman, and saying he wished to see a person who was expected to arrive on the boat from Canada went out. This is the last that is positively known of him, until the finding of his body by Captain Cook. He was a person of most exemplary character, and enjoyed, in a high degree, the respect of those who knew him.

For several months past a woman, calling herself A. A. Goddard, has been carrying on extensive "operations" in Roxbury, Mass, by which she has, it is alleged, victimized a number of merchants and respectable ladies in sums varying from five to several hundred dollars. She has been arrested.

There are twenty-three Savings Banks in New-Hampshire, and the amount of the deposits is $4,438,922. Massachusetts has eighty-six Savings Banks, with deposits amounting to $36,000,000. The present Savings Bank in Boston has deposits amounting to $5,906,943, or 1,769,921 more than all the savings institutions of New-Hampshire. About one fifth part of the total population of Massachusetts have funds in some savings institution.

AWFUL CASUALTY——SMOTHERED TO DEATH IN WHEAT.

A canal boat was being loaded with wheat from Giles's warehouse in Westport N. Y., on Saturday last by spouting it from the bottom of a bin 12 feet deep, when two boys named James Cagan and John Daily, aged respectively 12 and 10 years seeing the wheat rapidly settling in the bottom of the bin, thought it would be a fine source of amusement to play in it, and accordingly both at once jumped into the rapidly settling centre, and no sooner had they struck the wheat than they began to go down with it, and the surrounding wheat to cave in about them so rapidly that they could not extricate themselves. A smaller boy standing by gave the alarm, and in a moment a workman jumped in to rescue them, and actually got hold of them before they were below the grain, but they went down so fast, and he with them, that it was with the greatest effort on getting hold of the side of the bin that he got himself out, and ran to shut off the flow of wheat which was the work of a moment. The alarm was given and all hands rushed to their rescue, but they had been carried below the level of the grain, and after about fifteen minutes of the most strenuous exertion, they were exhumed, but not till life was extinct in both cases. They were found standing straight up, their heads by their sides and their hats on. They were two fine boys of worthy parents, who feel their sudden loss most keenly.—Milwaukee Sentinel, 10.

IS GARIBALDI A SCOTSMAN?—The following letter from Garibaldi to the inhabitants of the town of Nice, on being presented by them with a sword of honour, we think settles the question as to the nativity of this illustrious soldier:

"I am deeply affected and grateful for the generous act of my dear native Town. I consider the little I have done for the sacred national cause as only the duty of the citizen, and the satisfaction of my conscience is a sufficient reward. The honorable present which is so courteously made to me by the municipality of Nice is a recompence far beyond my merit. My arm may become weakened and unable to wield the sabre of honor which Nice bestows on me, but to my last breath my heart will lose nothing of its love and devotedness to my native land. Accept the expression of my affectionate gratitude.

GARIBALDI.

On Sunday morning, July 17, the body of a man was found floating in the Niagara River, at the foot of the ferry stairs, near the Falls. It was recognised as that of Samuel Broadhurst, who was drowned on Wednesday, while bathing near the ferry landing. The body was caught in the eddy and thus prevented from going down the river.

The number of public functionaries in Spain is 229,169, or one for every 73 of the population, a larger proportion than in any other country in Europe. In Spain the expense of collecting the taxes is more than 21½ per cent. of the amount; it is not half as much either in England, France or Belgium.

An Italian wife, who begged for a living in Cincinnati, recently ran off with another man because his "professional skill" in the art of begging was greater than her husband's. She took about $1,000 with her. The husband professes profound regret, as she was one of the best beggars he ever saw in Europe or America.

Dreadful Sufferings at Sea.

The melancholy loss of the ship Fleetwood, off Cape Horn, by striking on an ice berg, has just been made known. The ship, which was commanded by Captain Dale, was on a voyage to the Friendly Islands. On the 2nd of May, when in lat. 60 S., lon. 71 W., late in the evening, she came in contact with an iceberg, which carried away her stem, jibboom, bowsprit, and did other damage. On sounding the pumps, it was discovered that she was fast sinking. For 20 hours the crew worked steadily at the pumps, but the water increased and it was deemed advisable to abandon the ship—a desperate alternative. It was a dreadful night, and the sea rolled terrifically; only a portion of the crew could be induced to leave in the boats. The remainder of the men continued on board the ship, and at daybreak the boats, which had previously pulled off, resolved to return to the ship, and on approaching her saw that the whole who had remained by her had been swept off, and no doubt had perished. The ship went down soon afterwards. For five days the boats struggled against heavy seas.—An intense cold prevailed and the men not having the least nourishment suffered dreadfully. At length they were picked up by the British barque Imogene, from Liverpool. They had to be hauled up out of the boats, such was their exhausted condition. They were afterwards safely landed at Valparaiso.

Jews in America.

The Detroit Free Press gathers from a lecture recently delivered by Dr. Morris J. Franklin, in Providence, Rhode Island, some facts in relation to the Jews in the United States. The Jews in that country the speaker said, now numbered about two hundred thousand. In New York city alone there are forty thousand. The attention of the Jews in Europe is turned towards America, on account of the persecution to which they are subjected in some countries on the continent, and a rapid increase of their numbers here may be expected by immigration. Many Jews in this country are occupying prominent and influential positions in politics and business.—Messrs. Yulee and Benjamin, of the U. S. Senate, and Messrs. Zollicoffer, Oliver, Phillips and Hart of the National House of Representatives, are numbered among the children of Abraham. Instead of reading the Scriptures in the Hebrew tongue, understood only as the Rabbi interprets it, many now use the English version. This class have introduced many reforms into their mode of worship—they now have their choirs, their organs, and their Sabbath schools. The Hebrew Christians, the converted Jews, in this country, number three or four hundred, and of this number nearly one hundred are engaged in preaching the Gospel of Christianity, or in a course of study preparatory to doing so.

The Cost of the War.

The Constitutional devotes a long article to the consideration of the probable cost of the late war in Italy. It is not a difficult matter, it thinks, to arrive at an approximative estimate of the outlay by taking the expenditure of the Crimean war as the point of comparison, and bearing in mind the infinitely smaller amount of difficulty attendant on the transport of troops to a country so near as Piedmont. The following is an extract from the article:—

"If we consult the accounts of the Crimean war, we shall find that the extraordinary expenses it imposed on the country amounted to about 1,300,000,000 francs. And how long did that war last? Three years in a military and four in a financial, point of view. Now, 1,300,000,000 francs for three years would be 433,000,000 francs a year. But as the campaign in Italy has only lasted some months, no one can deny that it has cost much less than a year's war in the Crimea. This is not all. Not only has the war in Italy been very short, but must have occasioned a much less outlay for stores. Every thing cost very dear in the Crimea, where the country itself offered no resources; whilst in Italy, notwithstanding the depredations of the Austrian army, the French troops were able to procure, if not on the spot, at least in the neighboring provinces, part of what they required. The transports of men ammunition and provisions were also less onerous for Italy than for the Crimea. The transports figure for 150,000,000 francs in the budget of the Eastern war, we do not believe that they will amount to 59,000,000 fr. for the war in Italy; so that in this item alone the difference will be more than 100,000,000fr. We can do no better, however than make these comparisons—we can undertake to state that, according to calculations made, the war in Italy, if it had been prolonged, would not have absorbed at the end of the year more than 400,000,000fr. of the loan; so that there would have been 100,000,000fr., and a like sum coming from the new capital of the Bank to meet the campaign during the first months of the ensuing year without having need to create new resources. Our readers see, then, what a large sum the prompt conclusion of peace must leave disposable yet of the capital of the loan.

French Military.

As I walked through the picturesque streets towards the river I observed that several well-dressed groups were converging towards one point. To this I directed my course too, and after crossing a bridge near the gate in Stereograph, No. 63, and ascending a number of terrace-grounds, called, I believe, the Garenne, or Warren, where the Fifty-seventh Regiment of the line was going through its evolutions before the general of the district, who was staying at the same hotel as I. After manœuvring for some time the men piled arms and fell out of the ranks, when the band played some opera airs in a style of which we, in England, can form no conception. It was in the most perfect tune and time, and so light and graceful, I was quite enchanted.

I observed, too, that the officers and men treated each other with much more familiarity than is permitted in our army. They lighted their cigars and spoke as the case might be, and formed groups close to each other, talking and laughing without the slightest restraint. This arises, partly, no doubt from the different modes of raising the army in the two nations. Where men are obtained by voluntary recruiting none but the very lowest will enlist; whereas the conscription seizes impartially upon all classes, and many a poor gentleman finds himself obliged to shoulder a musket, with a tolerable prospect, however of obtaining a commission after a reasonable time. There is not, therefore, in the French service that almost impassable gulf which separates the officers from the men in ours. As far as the army itself is concerned, there can be no doubt that the French system is the best. It makes the profession of a soldier popular among a higher class than with us. But it would be an evil day indeed for England when war and a standing army came to be considered a means to an end; with the French it is the end itself. Military glory and the foolish pomp and parade of war, are dear to the people's souls; and for these mischievous toys they sacrifice rational liberty.—Tour in Britany.

Japanese Dislike to Strangers.

The Japanese authorities were evidently determined, if official obstructiveness could stop us, to leave no effort untried to do so. Even in the open sea between Vries Volcano and the entrance of Jeddo Gulf, two guard-boats succeeded in throwing themselves in our track. At first the officer of the watch innocently believed them to be fishermen, and dreaming of turbot and mackerel, edged towards the boats, favoring the Japanese manœuvre. When almost under the ship's bows, up went the little square flags, and out popped upon the deck of each boat a two sworded official, who, steadying himself against the excessive motion by placing his legs wide apart, waved frantically for the Furious to stop. The officer of the watch had directions to be perfectly deaf and blind for the next five minutes. The ship gave a shear, and went clear of the boats by a few yards. They might as well have requested the volcano behind them to cease smoking as to yell for us to stop. Stop, indeed! why, the old ship knew as well as we did that the wind was fair, and Yello right ahead, and this accounts for her incivility to Japanese guard boats, and her playful kick-up of the heels as she flung herself through the water at a nine-knot speed. The last we saw of the two officers was that one poor man performed a somersault, as his boat dived into a sea; and a somersault with two swords by his side, a queer-cut hat tied on literally to his nose, a shirt as stiff as if cut out of paper, and very bagging trousers, must be a feat not voluntarily gone through; while the other officer, who wisely had himself supported by two boatmen, continued to wave his arms, like an insane semaphore, so long as we looked at him.—Blackwood.

Camels in America.

Our Government has so much reason to be satisfied with its experiment of introducing camels into the country, that it is proposed as we understand, to increase the present stock by a new importation. Hitherto, all that have been introduced, comprising two importations, in number about sixty, have been carried to Texas, where arrangements were made, under favorable circumstances, to receive, acclimate, and train the animals, and test in all respects their adaptation for use in our western country. The experiment is considered as having been altogether successful. The cost of importation has been much less than was originally estimated; the animals are found more tractable and are more easily applied to the various kinds of labor for which they are wanted, than was anticipated; the acclimation of the camels is effected without hazard to their life or strength; and no serious obstacle, so far, is found to their introduction and use for many important purposes.

The new importation of camels is to be made from Mongolia. The present stock was brought wholly we believe, from the Mediterranean, and consists of Seenaar, Muscat, Siout and Mount Sinai dromedaries, and Tunis, Bactrian and Arabian camels. "Camel land," according to the best authorities, embraces the Canaries, Morocco, Algiers, Tunis, Tripoli, the Great Desert back of these countries, and Egypt, on the continent of Africa; Arabia, Turkey in Asia, Burmah, Thibet, Mongolia, and a small portion of the southern part of Siberia and Independent Tartary, in Asia; in the Crimea, and a small tract of country around and near Constantinople, in Europe. Extensive districts on the continent of America are yet to be added to this ennumeration, to give the camel a genial and useful home in every quarter of the globe. An attempt was made a hundred and fifty years ago to introduce the camel into Virginia, but it failed. That was before the "resolutions of '98" were adopted; but some other obstructions, or superstitions, or prejudices, or jealousies, arose upon the first intimation that the camels were coming, and succeeded in defeating the enterprise. The camel has existed in Tuscany two hundred years or more, but it has there been confined to the private estates of the Grand Duke. Whether the camels thus enslaved, took advantage of the sudden departure of their master, and sympathized with the people who got their backs up during the late war, and claimed to be liberated with the Italian population, and to enjoy a wider range of territory, we do not know. But as the Grand Duke is, according to the present understanding of the terms of peace, to go back again, it is probable that the camels will be driven back to their first estate, and, like the Italian people, far worse hereafter, for having coveted greater liberty and a larger share than is consistent with the arrangements of the great powers.

It was wise to enlarge our camel experiment by an importation from Mongolia, where the animals exist in great numbers, where they are among the strongest of their kind, and where the climate is so vigorous as to qualify them for almost any section of our country. Sudden and great changes of temperature are of frequent occurrence in Mongolia. Although the heat of summer is almost insupportable, on account of the absence of trees and the sandy surface of the country, no month of the year is free from snow and even frost. The quantity of snow which annually falls, however, is comparatively small, and much less than that which covers our western plains. This is owing to the great dryness of the air, which unfits the soil for agricultural purposes. Notwithstanding the snow, vast herds of camels, which constitute the wealth of the Mongols, find subsistence upon the plains all the year round. The camels of Mongolia are also accustomed to severe labor, and to the carriage of heavy burdens four or five hundred pounds being a common load. These animals can easily be imported into this country, through the North Pacific ocean to California.

It is now three years since the first camels were introduced into Texas, and the depot for their acclimation and instruction established at what is called Camp Verde, about sixty miles from San Antonio. The experiment was made in accordance with an act of Congress, of March, 1855, under direction of Mr. Jefferson Davis, then Secretary of War. The design of the act was the employment of camels for army transportation and other military purposes; and $30,000 was appropriated for the object. Maj. Wayne of the army, and Lieut. Porter of the navy, were commissioned jointly to go to the Levant with a naval vessel to purchase and bring home a collection of the animals. They obtained thirty-three—nine dromedaries and twenty-four camels; one camel having been presented by the Bey of Tunis, and six dromedaries by the Viceroy of Egypt. The ship having been admirably fitted for the purpose, these animals, notwithstanding an unusually rough passage, were safely transported to the place prepared for them in Texas.—The number was increased by one on the passage, and the animals were landed in a better condition than when they were taken on board.

The training of the camels has been very successfully conducted by Major Wayne; the animals are found to be docile and tractable, and are easily set to work. They have been employed in caravans on several occasions for the transportation of heavy army and other stores, with the best results and have been found admirably adapted to expeditions for the construction of military roads and for other objects, where carriage by waggons would be difficult and very expensive, if not wholly impracticable.—They will carry on their backs from three to five hundred weight each, over the roughest roads, with comparative ease and wonderful rapidity, and perform journeys, thus loaded, under which horses and mules would sink.

The time has come for attempting, on an ample scale, the breeding and general introduction of camels into this country. This should be done by the government directly, or under the immediate direction of those public officers who have been successful in the treatment and employment of the camel, even beyond the most sanguine anticipations. So long as railroads across the vast plains and deserts and mountain regions which lie between us and the Pacific, are for various reasons impossible, the camel will be found an efficient substitute for that mode of transportation; and it is believed that a good portion of the vast sums now expended for army transportation to the distant points where our scattered army is called to operate, might be saved by the employment of this patient, powerful, docile, and incomparably useful animal.

BROCK'S MONUMENT.

The Colonist announces that Brock's monument has at length been completed; and has been handed over to the Building Committee by the Contractors. In noticing this fact the Colonist remarks:

The war of 1812 is that part of our short history to which we can look back with the greatest pride. It is removed far from all sources of present discord—it was the first deed of purely Canadian chivalry, its chief glories were all our own—and now, when time has removed all the harsher features of the scene, all the sad recollections which must have followed the memories of those who fell, the jealousies, the heartburnings, mistakes and errors which doubtless occurred, we can look back upon it with unmingled triumph. The flood of heroic deeds achieved by men of British race, which has rolled on from Hastings to Inkermau and Lucknow, and which has spread over every land from east to west, presents few brighter spots than the defence of Canada, in 1812, and there are few names to us as Canadians so dear as that of the hero who was then our chief, and who fell at the head of the Canadian volunteers.

It is fitting then that while those deeds are still fresh in our memories, while many of the actors in them are still able to tell the story while the flag under which Brock conquered still floats over the soil, despite of foes without and traitors within,—it is fitting we say that we should heartily join from one end of the Province to the other worthily to inaugurate the monument which we have raised to the memory of Sir Isaac Brock.

No more suitable day can be named than the 13th of October next, the anniversary of the battle of Queenston. Let the committee to whom the charge of the monument has been entrusted, or the militia authorities, make a proposal to that effect, and we venture to say that the militia-men throughout the Province, individually and collectively, the municipalities and other corporate bodies, will meet with a most hearty response. Now that the monument is complete, it is time that the matter was taken up in earnest. There is a good harvest before us, and our people will not grudge the expense. Let the press take the matter up, so that all may know what is required of them. This is no party question. It is one of the few things in which we can all heartily unite. It concerns neither the Government, except so far as their co-operation may be required, nor the politicians, except so far as they are true Canadians. It is the people's task, and to the people—and to the men of 1812, whose influence is not slight amongst us—we confidently appeal.

Another Abduction Case.

A YOUNG GIRL ENTICED AWAY FROM HER HOME, AND RUINED.

(From the Detroit Free Press.)

On Monday last the circus of Antonin and Wilder, that has been performing in this city was at Trenton, a few miles below this city. They reached that place, from their preceding stoppage, in companies, a few at a time coming in on Sunday. A portion of them stopped at the village of Flat Rock, not far from Trenton, where they had occasion to get some washing done. In this family there was a young girl, a daughter about fifteen years of age, a simple, ignorant country girl, but possessed more than ordinary beauty. She attracted the attention of one of the strolling performers, who found but little difficulty in getting into acquaintance with her. He finally proposed to her that she should accompany them to the village to see the circus. This was a proposition that met with a willing response from the girl, and she went with him. After the performance he urged her to come on to Detroit, promising her that, after she had seen all that was to be seen in the city, he would give her what money she wanted to get back home, besides paying all her expenses while there. The girl had never been in the city, and was of course only too happy at the prospect of visiting it, and inspecting all its wonderful sights. She readily consented, and, at the close of the evening's performance started with the company.—On their arrival here she was taken to a house of ill-fame under the guise of a female boarding-house. Here he visited her from time to time, giving her perfect liberty to go and come when she pleased, only that she was to be accompanied by one of the "young ladies," lest she should get lost. On the first night of her stoppage at this house she visited the circus with some of the prostitutes, whom she supposed to be respectable young ladies, and at the close of the performance was escorted to her boarding place by the actor. He endeavored to persuade her to marry him, but she would not consent to this unless the consent of her parents was first obtained.—He then attempted to induce her to allow him to remain with her, but she stoutly refused.

On the following day he called and had an interview with her in the presence of several of the inmates of the house. At this interview it would seem that the depraved women partially threw off the disguise of virtue, and assisted the actor to accomplish his purpose. They endeavored to induce the girl to yield to him, exhibiting themselves as examples of the innocence of such proceedings, and carefully detailing to her the immense profits they realized from such a life. They showed her their gay dresses and rich jewelry; they told her that they were never obliged to work, but always had plenty of money with which to here; that when they went anywhere they always had a carriage to ride in; and enlarged upon the desirableness of the life of abandon they led. She listened with innocent astonishment to their stories, but still withstood the temptation. Fearing to drive her away they desisted for the time from their endeavors, and, without alluding further to the subject, began to favor and flatter her, to restore her to confidence.—The girl was so ignorant of the ways of the world outside of the innocent country life she had always lived as never for a moment to entertain any fear of the company she was in. On the following night the actor again visited the house. No reference was made to the conversation of the morning, nor any allusion made to his desires. A friendly conversation was commenced, during which a bottle of wine was introduced, of which all drank. In a few minutes the girl became sleepy and was assisted to bed. When she awoke in the morning her ruin had been accomplished, and her seducer lay beside her. She rose quickly and silently, fearing to disturb him, and, dressing herself, escaped from the house.

Mr. LaFontaine, the father of the girl, arrived in the city yesterday in search of his daughter. He related his story and the circumstances of her disappearance to Messrs. Gunning and Blodgett, private detectives, who at once set to work to find the girl. They met her in the street about noon, and at once restored her to her father, when she related the above story.—She had been wandering about since morning, endeavoring to meet somebody whom she had before seen, but without success. She was confused and bewildered when she left the house where she had been ruined, and was unable to tell where it was. The officers tried to induce her father to remain in Town long enough to identify her seducer, but for some reason he declined doing this, and left in the afternoon on the Pearl for Trenton, taking her with him. It seems a pity that so deserving a scoundrel should go unpunished, but, if so greatly injured parties as these refuse to institute proceedings, it is impossible that the laws can be enforced.

Napoleon's Influence in Italy.

As to Kossuth, Klapka, Teleki and their band of fire-eating insurrectionists, they came to Genoa like shadows, and have so departed. They did not know what to do with the Hungarian Legion assembled at Aqui; so M. Pietri, the old Prefect of Police, was despatched by the Emperor on a mission of enlightenment to Turin to tell them immediately what to do, viz: To disband the legion instantly, and it was disbanded instantly.

A threat which causes great emotion at Turin is that made to Cavour to explain to the Chambers the motives of his resignation, and to reveal all that has taken place between himself and the Emperor during the last year. In Paris, however, the threat has caused no emotion whatever; we know the Corporal will not dare disobey the orders already issued by the General—to keep peace himself and suffer no other man to speak either.

THE POPE, THE CATHOLIC POWERS, AND THE INFIDELS.

The Pope has addressed an autograph letter to the Cardinal Bishop of Albano, requesting him to invite all the faithful of Rome to join in a solemn thanksgiving for the cessation of the war.

The following is the principal passage of this document:

To thank God for the restoration of peace between the two great Catholic belligerent powers is our duty; but to continue our prayers is a necessity, inasmuch as divers provinces of the Church are still a prey to the men who are intent upon demolishing the established order of things, and it is with this view that in our days a foreign usurping power proclaims that God has made man free as regardeth his political opinions, thus denying the authorities established by God upon earth, and to whom obedience and respect are due, forgetting at the same time the immortality of the soul, which, when it passeth from this transitory state to the eternal one, shall have to answer the all-powerful and inexorable judge for those religious opinions; then, learning there is but one God and one faith, and that whoever quitteth the ark of unity shall be submerged in the deluge of eternal punishment.

Colonial Defences.

It is not wonderful that in the present disturbed state of Europe, when war or revolution tour in threatening aspects, that the question should be asked in England, 'Are our colonies in a state of defence?' Nor is it wonderful if, on the other hand, the people of the parent state, heavily taxed as they are for the military service, enquire whether the Colonies which demand so large a proportion of the armaments of the Empire for their defence contribute anything like a proportionate amount towards the outlay. Accordingly we find that Mr. Adderley, in the House of Commons, has opened up the latter question.—He stated that the cost of the military defences of the Colonies, exclusive of military stations, amounts to $2,500,000, towards which the Colonies contribute only £220,000. Of this, however, Canada, Australia and the Cape contribute a very small portion. On the other hand it is to be observed that in the whole of the colonies, (exclusive of the military stations) there were but 22,000 soldiers. Mr. Adderly complained bitterly that England should be called upon to supply the colonies with military stores, barracks and every species of naval defences and argued that it was dangerous to teach them to lean upon the Mother Country, to the extinction of their own military spirit. He did not think that in placing military power in the hands of the Colonists, that it would be used to win independence. But he would rather see that come to pass than that the present condition of things should be continued. Hon. Mr. S. Herbert expressed his opinion that the mother-country has to bear an unfair proportion of the military defence of the Colonies, and stated that the subject was under the consideration of three gentlemen of experience. Mr. Hallburton made his appearance in the debate upon this subject, and indulged himself in an outburst of gasconade, which betrayed his American associations. He took a cursory survey of colonial grievances and colonial prospects, and argued that it would be unreasonable to ask Colonists to defend their territory in ware concerning which they had no interest and no voice. He recommended the completion of the railway system from New Brunswick to Quebec, by which means troops could be sent into Canada in twelve days whenever their presence might be deemed necessary. It is very probable that we shall be called upon, before long, to place ourselves in a more efficient state of defence; and few will be inclined to complain of this if, with a voluntary system of service, the voice of the men be permitted to be heard in the appointment of the officers of certain grades, and that a political use of the patronage which will be involved, be not attempted. It is not pleasant to feel that we exist by sufferance. One's manhood naturally desires a basis more consistent with self-respectable, and few would shrink from a reasonable sacrifice in effecting such a result.—Hamilton Times.

A Western Prize Fight.

DONNYBROOK FAIR WITH MISSOURI ADDITIONS.

The following description of a prize fight between Byrne and Connors, of St. Louis, on an island in the river, above Alton, we cut from the Missouri Democrat. The fight took place on the 9th.

The Steamers Henrietta and Elvira were chartered respectively by the Connors and Byrne parties, to convey the admiring hosts to the battle ground. Some quite needless apprehensions were expressed lest the police should prevent the excursion, and numbers accordingly left the city for the spot, on Monday.

The selected ground was gained about two o'clock. Some fifteen hundred people gathered "to see the show." At half-past three, Byrne "shied his castor" into the ring, and was at once followed by Connors. The friends of each were sanguine, and bet freely in behalf of their champion. Connors was accompanied by his backer, who immediately offered to wager $200 that Shanghai would win. Byrne coolly came forward with a bag of silver and accepted the bet. Connors' seconds were Billy Penny and Valentine McKinney, while those of "Jim" were Quinn and Looney. The men were at once stripped and at work in the ring. Byrne was knocked down in the first round. In the second there was much sparring, with little hitting. Conners saved his face very skillfully, and watched his chance wearily. The third was worse for each, but not serious, and closed with Shanghai down. The fourth, fifth, and sixth were concluded by a heavy fall of Connor's on Byrne's ribs. The former kept himself unscratched, while his adversary was less successful. The remaining rounds were contested with dauntless spirit on each side. During the fourteenth Shanghai was brought to his knees, and while in that position was struck. There rose at once the cry of "Foul play!" and the referee re-affirmed that decision. The victory was thus awarded to Connors—When this decision was announced, Byrne fiercely remonstrated. Some five or six hundred outsiders then burst into the ring and a general row ensued. Byrne seized the referee, Moreland, by the throat, saying "Do you mean to say I've lost it?"—Moreland was then attacked by Byrne's principals, was struck and kicked, and had a portion of his face gouged out with a stick. Connors with the most of his party, immediately drew off to their boat, while the balance remained fighting with the Byrne men, the most of whom gradually followed to the Henrietta. Stripped, bloody and enraged, Byrne dared Connors to come out and finish the fight, which he declined under the circumstances to do. Then many of Connors men rushed on shore and joined their comrades, and a scene of riot and murderous attack followed which baffles description. Knives were freely used, bottles, sticks, and rocks were hurled, and at last a shot was fired. This was the signal for a general drawing of pistols, and some one hundred shots were rapidly fired. Those who had no pistols rushed for their boats, which at the same time began backing off from the shore. There was then a heavy rush to get on board, and some forty persons were instantly in the river. Certain skiff-men pulled away in terror, leaving the victims to swim or drown as they might.—One or two fights occurred in the water. The swimmers at length scrambled on board not knowing how many had sunk and been drowned. Probably three or four had perished, at least. The Henrietta was soon following the Elvira, both boats leaving numbers behind them on the island. It was about 4½ o'clock p. m. Montgomery had narrowly escaped drowning, having leaped overboard to save a man who appeared helpless and being himself drawn out by his son, the son also succeeded in saving the man. One wretch who was shockingly cut had been with great difficulty rescued by getting him on a plank. The mood of the Henrietta may be inferred from the fact that some twenty fights were waged on board before she reached Alton! Whiskey reigned. There were robberies and complaints of robberies of watches, pocket books, &c., which had to be rectified by attacking the robber or robbed. One victim, accused of having stolen a purse of $20, was assaulted by several persons with such fury that he sought his revolver. His act being perceived, there arose a cry of "kill him, kill him!" and a fresh onset was made upon him. In response he ate, bit, kicked, tore and scratched his opponents in such a style which should entitle him to the laurels and stakes of the glorious day. By nearly tearing off his pants, the pistol was taken from him—and also, as he alleged $40 dollars of his hard earnings. Finally he was kicked senseless dragged to the barricane deck, and left to revive or die.—Shortly came off a fight for the possession of a pistol, between John Monaghan and John Ryan, which resulted in the casual discharge of the weapon. Its contents passed into the abdomen of Ryan, inflicting a shocking and probably fatal wound. Monaghan was at once subdued by this incident. He sat down and wept over the wounded man, declaring that Ryan was one of his best friends. An impression to some extent prevailed, that a pistol was actually fired by Ryan. In ten minutes afterwards Monaghan jumped over-board, and swam toward the Illinois shore, then nearly two miles distant. When last seen from the boat he was still swimming, about half a mile from the bank. The shooting of Ryan caused a temporary tranquility on board but in half-an-hour the decree of fight was again raging. Many were cut and otherwise injured, but no more pistols were fired, nor do we learn that any one was dangerously stabbed. To avoid a collision with the party of the Elvira, the Henrietta prudently made fast near Anderson's Mill, in North St. Louis. Her passengers passed off upon a raft, and thence to the shore. Thus appears to have progressed, but scarcely yet to have terminated, one of the most thoroughly disgusting and disgraceful affairs which ever brought dishonour upon a city.

ANOTHER CASE OF STABBING AT CENTERVILLE, IN THE COUNTY OF LINCOLN.

From the Hamilton Times.

The news of the savage attack upon Deputy Sheriff Kerby, which we made public in our issue on Monday morning, produced a painful impression in this city, where Mr. Kerby has many friends. On Monday morning we despatched a correspondent to the scene of the affray, and from him we have received the following ample statement of the facts of the case. The rash criminal who has endangered the life of a public servant, and thereby placed himself in jeopardy, is named Alexander Bradley. He is a person of indifferent character and keeps a tavern at Slabtown. On a Saturday afternoon Mr. Kerby and his bailiff, Mr. McGregor, went to Bradley's house, in the performance of their duty, to distrain on account of an execution at the suit of one H. R. Dee, for a sum of about twenty pounds. Mr. Bradley first disavowed any knowledge of such a person, and that he never owed any such debt. A conversation ensued, in which no ill-feeling was exhibited by either party, and Bradley then said that the late Deputy Sheriff, Mr. Mercer, now of Norfolk, had collected the amount, and he produced two receipts of Mercer, neither of which, however, were on account of this suit. This was explained to Bradley, and he was told the writ must be executed unless the money was paid. The plaintiff had pointed out two scows, and four horses, as property which might be distrained, and the officers made enquiries concerning them. The scows were one at St. Catherines, the other at Port Colborne. The horses Bradley refused to point out. Kerby then said that he thought that two of the horses were in a neighboring field, and asked Bradley to let him have halters to put on them. He refused, and began to exhibit anger, declaring that neither horse nor halters should leave the premises. Kerby and Mr. McGregor than left the house and enquired whose the two horses referred to were.—Learning that they were Bradley's McGregor went away to purchase a rope, and Kerby caught the horses, which he found had head stalls on, and led them towards the road. Bradley now interfered, and swore that no horse should leave the field. In vain Mr. Kerby reasoned with Bradley, pointing out the consequence of resistance and its folly. Bradley continued to swear that the horses should not leave the premises Kerby remonstrated again with him, and McGregor, having now returned with the ropes, they [McGregor and Kerby] proceeded to fasten them to the head gear of the horses. By this time Bradley's wife was on the spot, and a son, who held in his a large stone. S. D. Woodruff and Mr. Thos. Adams passed by in a buggy, and these gentlemen advised Bradley not to resist; but he replied in violent language that the horses should not be taken. As soon as the Deputy Sheriff attempted to fasten the rope to the halter of one horse [McGreagor having the other], Bradley commenced an attack. He was seen to put his hand in his vest pocket and immediately attempted to cut the nose-band of the horse, which Kerby held, and then made a blow at Kerby, striking him in the stomach, and taking away his breath. McGregor then laid hold of him, when he in his turn was attacked by the son. McGregor was down and Kerby went to his assistance, and struck the elder Bradley. Only now Kerby felt pain from the blow he had received, and looking down, saw that blood was flowing freely. He called to McGregor to get up and come away, telling him that he was stabbed. With some difficulty, McGregor disengaged himself, and hastened to Kerby's assistance, who by this time was fainting for want of blood. Mr. Kerby was then brought to St. Catherines and placed under medicial care.

It is stated by Bradley's friends that the stabbing was accidental. For the honour of human nature we wish this may be true; but the previous behaviour of the whole family almost precludes the idea. While the contest was going on, the wife of Bradley stood by, shouting, "Murder them! murder them!" On Saturday four constables started out to arrest Bradley; but he retired to the house, and swore so vehemently that he would shoot any one who approached it, that the men, deeming discretion the better part of valor, awaited the course of events at a safe distance from the desperado.

When it became known in St. Catherines that he had assumed this attitude, there was a strong desire expressed that the Rifle Company should be turned out to ensure his capture. The Magistrates of the town, however, showed no anxiety to take upon themselves the responsibility of signing the necessary requisition, and it was almost midnight before the Warden of the County, J. C. Bykert, Esq., could be found. He at once signed the requisition, and in the course of a few minutes Captain Clark had his company out.

In the meantime stirring events had taken place at Slabtown. Bradley is a prominent Orangeman, an ex-Master of the lodge which meets in his house. As soon as the intelligence of the affair had reached St. Catherines, one Wm. Cook, a newly-appointed Magistrate, and an employee of the American Express Company, hastened out to Bradley, and informed him he was to be taken dead or alive; so that by the time the constables had arrived, several Orangemen, (as many, it is said as forty,) fully armed, were posted in and about the premises; and they plainly stated that Bradley should not be arrested. One of the constables, Develin, himself an Orangeman—the rest being Roman Catholics—was permitted to see Bradley, and finding how impossible it was to execute the warrant, he returned into town to inform the Mayor, Mr. Adams, of the state of matters. He was soon followed by the rest of the constables, who were alarmed at the threats which were made against them by a force so superior to them in numbers.

The Rifle Company reached Slabtown about one o'clock, a. m., and found the house still garrisoned by armed men, who defied the Rifle Company as they had defied the constables. Sheltered as they were in the building, the Orangemen had the Rifles at a disadvantage, and a parley ensued.—The Warden was the only person permitted to approach this fortification, and he was impressed with the desperate nature of the enterprise, and advised the captain to march off the force, a suggestion which that gallant officer acceded to; and a little after three o'clock the company arrived safe and sound in St. Catherines, and were soon abed. It is supposed that immediately after the constables left, Bradley was sent off towards the border; and the continued defence of the premises was merely a feint to give him time to escape.

At noon, on Monday, Mr. Cook on behalf of Bradley, called on Mayor Adams to ascertain whether, in case Bradley gave himself up, bail would be taken, to which, of course, the Mayor gave a negative reply. At six o'clock the Mayor took Mr. Kerby's deposition, which we will give in full to-morrow. A warrant having been issued against the son and wife of Bradley, the latter gave herself up, and was admitted to bail, herself in $400 and two sureties in $200 each. The son is still at large.

We are happy to state that at eight o'clock on Monday evening, the medical attendants reported very favorably of Mr. Kerby's condition. The wound was inflicted by a very small knife, and is about two inches deep. We need not say that the deepest indignation is felt at this bold interference with the due course of law by members of the Orange Society, and deep sympathy with Mr. Kerby.

THE DOINGS OF A HIRELING PRESS.

"Be not given to change" is the pious exhortation of the modern Solon of the Review, on all appropriate occasions, "Like your fathers who were all loyal subjects in word and deed, be ye fleeced in unity and love by Sydney Smith & Co., for ye are the sheep that grow wool for them, and as loyal subjects it is your duty to submit to the scissors in and out of season." "Detest every innovation on the glorious institutions of your country" says the same luminary, "protest with all your might against a written constitution, but oh, aid 'our institution' in Cobourg with a little of the needful from the public purse, for it was for these glorious institutions your ancestors fought and bled. Therefore listen not to the treasonable ravings of the Toronto Globe and Montreal Witness. Attend therefore to the pious injunctions of Edgerton and beware of the men who are given to change. "Do ye grumblers of Peterboro' aid us by your influence in continuing a By-law for the sale of produce at the Market," recifefates this magnate as he sits enthroned in the editorial chair, with all the pomp and consequence of a fantastic old Dutchess on a holiday; "to continue the By-law will increase the prosperity of the town; 'tis all very fine for Cluxton & Co., to say the contrary," accompanying these last words with a stern look, and giving his curls an aristocratic toss of defiance at his opponents.

There is nothing which excites our risible propensities more than the "airs" adopted by men who have acquired a little property, when we hear them talk and act with all the dignity of a Turkish Bashaw. What a pity it is that we have not in Canada an order of "nobility" as it exists in some countries and who would be more deserving of being placed at the head of the order than the Solon of the Review & Co., for verily they are deserving though they do not belong to the order of nature's nobility.

Milk which does not Yield Butter, and the means to Remedy it.

The author calls the attention of those who are chiefly interested in such cases, in which there is no disease of the mammary gland nor loss of milk, but a want of oleaginous matters in the fluid. In the causes of this deficiency of butter making quality, he concludes that there are two principal ones, viz.: idiosyncrasy and alimentation; but, there is another which cannot be so easily defined, and which occurs in animals that are well kept and whose milk has been previously rich in butter. It is to these that the remedy is principally directed. The remedy consists in giving the animal two ounces of the sulphuret of antimony, with three ounces of coriander seeds, powdered and well mixed. This is to be given as a soft bolus, and followed by a draught composed of half a pint of vinegar, a pint of water, and a handful of common salt, for three successive mornings, on an empty stomach.

The remedy, according to the author, rarely fails, and the milk produced some days after its exhibition is found to be richer in cream. The first churning yields a larger quantity of butter, but the second and the third are still more satisfactory in their results.

A letter from a farmer states that he had fourteen cows in full milk, from which he obtained very little butter, and that of a bad quality. Guided by the statements of M. Deneubourg, which had appeared in the Annales Veterinaires, he had separately tested the milk of his cows, and found that the bad quality of it was owing to one cow only, and that the milk of the others yielded good and abundant butter. It was, therefore, clearly established that the loss he had so long sustained was to be attributed to this cow only. He at once administered the remedy recommended by M. Deneubourg, which effected a cure.—Veterinarian.

Washing Horses Legs.

It is quite a common custom earmen and hostlers to "founder" noble horses, by the erroneous practice of dashing of cold water on their legs when they are dirty.—In regard to this practice Sir George Stephens the eminent viterinary surgeon says Wherever it is necessary to wash horses legs, do it in the morning. Most grooms, acting on a different principle, wash them as soon as the animal comes in. I am convinced this is a bad practice. When the roads are dirty, washing can do no harm; but to deluge the legs with water the moment a horse enters the yard, heated with exercise, is to my mind, as unnatural and absured as to jump into a shower-bath after playing an hour at cricket. My plan is, rubbing down with straw and a dry brush, and the next morning wash as clean as soap and water can make them. Pick and wash the soles as soon as the horse comes in."

We see by an article in the London Gardener's Chronicle that American mowing machines are getting into favor in that country almost as rapidly as reapers have done. Some difficulty has been experienced there, as it has here, from the fact that most of the machines were adapted to cutting lighter grass than such as is grown by high farming generally in England, and in some cases in this country. The condition that the grass is left in by the machine is much liked by the English farmers, as it saves tedding.

The surest way to fill a private apartment, whether in a printing-office, a cotton-factory, or manage-shop with visitors, is to place over the door a placard, bearing the inscription—"No Admittance." No person ever read that prohibition over an entrance without instantly being attacked by an ungovernable desire to rush right in.

PHONOGRAPHY,
or
WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six; So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the Manual of Phonography, and the Phonographic Copy Book, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn Phonography from the Manual without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

The Scientific American
TO BE ENLARGED!
A NEW VOLUME—NEW SERIES,
TO COMMENCE ON JULY 2d, 1859.

Instead of 416 pages, the yearly volume, Enlarged Series, will contain eight hundred and thirty-two pages of valuable reading matter, useful and instructive to all classes.

THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN is published weekly in quarto form, suitable for binding, and the numbers for a single year contains information in regard to new inventions, Machinery, all branches of Manufacturing processes, Agricultural Implements, Engineering, Millwrighting, Iron Manufacture, chemistry; in fact, almost every industrial pursuit receives more or less attention in its columns.

All Patent claims officially published every week, as reported from the Patent Office; and for

INVENTORS AND PATENTEES

It contains information not to be obtained elsewhere, and which no mechanic, inventor or patentee can well do without.

As a Family Journal it has no superior for real practical utility, since in its columns will be found useful practical receipes.

Careful attention will be given, from time to time, to reports of the Metal, Lumber and other Markets.

Every number will contain sixteen pages and forty-eight columns of matter, with several illustrations of patented machines and other engravings, comprising in a single year about
SIX HUNDRED ORIGINAL ENGRAVINGS.

With the Enlarged Series is presented an opportunity to subscribe not likely to occur again for many years. It will be like commencing a new work—Vol. 1, No. 1, new Series

Send in your subscriptions without delay, as to begin the new volume—July 2 next.

Terms $2 a Year—$1 for Six Months.

Southern, Western and Canadian money or Post Office stamps taken at par for subscriptions. Canadian subscribers will please to remit twenty-six cents extra on each year's subscription, to pre-pay postage.

A liberal discount to clubs. A prospectus giving full particulars of the inducements for clubs, with specimen copies of the paper, and a pamphlet of information concerning the procuring of Patents may be had gratis, by addressing

Selected Poetry.

Treasures of Thought.

We would like to grasp the hand that wrote this little poem. A pleasant thing it is to meet a man whose mind is not made drunken by the spirit of this selfish age. These verses are worth more than a nugget. Reader, treasure them: it is no shame to allow a flower of sentiment to fill a corner in the business heart. Business becomes a murderish tyrant when it crushes out human nature's finer instincts and susceptibilities:

If thou hast thrown a glorious thought
Upon life's common ways,
Should other men the gain have caught
Fret not to lose the praise.

Great thinker, often thou shalt find
While folly plunders fame,
To thy rich store the crowd is blind
Nor knows thy very name.

What matters that, if thou uncoil
The soul that God has given,
Not in the world's mean eye to toil,
But in the sight of Heaven?

If thou art true, yet in thee lurks
For fame a human sigh;
To nature go, and see how works
That handmaid of the sky.

Her own deep bounty she forgets
In full of germs and seeds,
Nor glorifies herself, nor sets
Her flowers above her weeds,

She hides, the modest leaves between,
She loves untrodden reads;
Her richest treasures are not seen
By any eye but God's.

Accept the lesson. Look not for
Reward; from out thee chase
All selfish ends, and ask no more
Than to fulfil thy place.

COUSIN HANNAH.

BY CAROLINE F. PRESTON.

"Arabella, I have some news for you," said Mrs. Holmes, as the latter came from a shopping excursion.

"What is it? Pleasant I hope."

"Humph? There may be two opinions about that."

"At any rate tell me. I'm all in a fidget to find out."

"Well, I have received a letter from your uncle Benjamin, saying that with my permission his daughter will come and make us a visit of a week or a fortnight."

"O, dear what a trial! He's a farmer, isn't he?"

"Yes."

"And I suppose she's a countrified body, with a gait like an elephant, and a regular Yankee twang."

"Very likely. I haven't been there since she was a baby, and now she's eighteen—just your age."

"When is she coming?"

"She will be here early next week, your uncle writes."

"And our party comes off Friday evening. How unlucky. What will Mr. Stanton say? What sort of an idea will he get of our connections?"

"I suppose everybody has some vulgar relations."

"Yes, but they take care to keep them in the background. Couldn't you write to have the visit postponed a week?"

"No, she'd be sure to find out why it was, and your uncle would be offended."

"That wouldn't be much matter, would it?"

"Considerable just now, as I am intending to get an invitation for us both to spend the summer at his farm house. He has a fine farm and we should have a delightful time."

"So we should. Well, I must do my best, then, to play the agreeable to this countrified cousin of mine. I only hope she won't disgrace us."

"We can keep her in the background as much as possible without exciting her suspicions. Very likely she may be diffident, and that will help us."

It will be readily guessed, from the preceding conversation, that Arabella Holmes and her mother were not a whit more unselfish or disinterested than the majority of their fashionable neighbors.

This Mr. Stanton to whom Arabella had referred, was a rising young lawyer, of a good family, and considered an excellent match. It may be that Arabella had designs upon him, but if so, we will respect the lady's secret and leave it for to be guessed at.

Days slipped away, and on Tuesday of the following week the country cousin arrived. The servant, supposing that the ladies had gone out, ushered her at once into the chamber designed for her occupation. Now it happened that Arabella's chamber was the one adjoining, and that she and her mother were just then sitting down there.

"I suppose my cousin will be here this afternoon," said Arabella.

"Yes, I presume so."

"By the way, what is her name?"

"It is really ridiculous, but I can't remember. Your uncle did not mention it in his letter."

"Some country appendage most likely. Rachel or Hepsibah, or something of the kind. Do you suppose she talks very broad Yankee."

"I am afraid she does," said Mrs. Holmes. "Farmer's daughters most generally do, I suppose."

"I suppose her talk will be about cousins and such things."

All this could be distinctly heard by the object of the flattering remarks.

"Humph!" said she, "I see what my aunt and cousin are expecting in me. Really it would be a pity to disappoint them."

She glided down stairs and in a few minutes was introduced to her aunt and cousin.

"How do you do, aunt?" said she in the most polite tone she could assume—"Pretty sweet of your nephew, and you?"

"Good heavens, what a daughter!" thought Arabella.

"O, they're pretty chirp. This is cousin Arabeller, aint it?"

Arabella extended her hand languidly.

"Hope you're well cousin. You visit married, are you?"

"I don't approve of early marriages," said her mother speaking for her.

"That's what I told Jim Doolittle last week, said he—O, her, what was I going to say?" she interrupted herself with a semblance of bashful confusion. . .

"You may catch a city beau," said Arabella, keeping as sober as she could.

"You don't think so, though, do you? Well, I believe I should like a city feller. You'll introduce me all around, won't you?"

"O, dear, what made me suggest such a thing to her," thought Arabella, troubled. "Now, she'll be putting herself forward and disgust everybody."

"Does your father keep many cows?" asked Arabella, desirous of drawing out her rustic cousin, and leading her to say something ridiculous.

"Cawes?" returned her cousin with volubility. He's got ten. There is a brown beifer with a white streak running along her back; that's mine. Quite a nice present wasn't it? I guess she's worth about twenty-five dollars."

"Really, quite a fortune," said Arabella. "By the way, cousin, I'm ashamed to confess it, but I don't remember your name—Christian name, I mean."

"Hannah," was the reply, "I was named after Aunt Hannah; Hannah Brown isn't so bad a name. Do you think it is?"

"How horribly old fashioned!" thought Arabella, but she only said, "O, no, it's quite tasteful and genteel, though I dare say you won't object to changing the last name by and by, will you?"

"O, you sly critter," laughed Hannah. "You'll make me color up to the roots of my hair if you go on so. I aint in no hurry. Some time or other perhaps somebody will take me off my father's hands."

"What do you think of her," asked Arabella, when they were alone.

"She's quite good-looking, and is better dressed than I expected to see."

"I admit all that. But what a plebian name she has got."

"What is it."

"Hannah."

"Horrid! How could her father fasten such a name on her."

"O, she was named after an aunt, I believe."

"Not after me, thank goodness."

"Then what a perfect rustic she is.—Such country phrases! Did you notice her first words, 'How do you dew?' Could anything be more countrified? Must she appear at the party?"

"I don't see how it can be helped."

"I tremble to think how she will behave. Ten to one she will begin to talk of her father's cows. That's about all she can talk about."

"Her conversational powers do appear rather limited."

"What's that?" asked Hannah, taking up a French book from the table. "It's the queerest words I ever got hold of. I can't make out what it means."

"O, that's a French book," said Arabella condescendingly.

"Is it though, really? You can't read it, can you?"

"O, certainly."

"Why won't you read me a little?

Arabella was not a very profound French scholar, but she liked to show off, and confiding in her cousin's ignorance she translated a page quite volubly, though with additions and alterations, which would have astonished any competent scholar.

"Lor, how learned you must be," was Hannah's comment. "It took you a good while to learn, didn't it?"

"Yes," said Arabella, rendered quite gracious by the compliment. "However, I had a natural turn for it, so I suppose I made more rapid progress than some."

The next day the ball was spoken of.

"What! Are you going to have a ball?" I never was at one of your city parties. I shall enjoy it ever so much."

"What will be fun to you will be death to me," thought Arabella. "I wish you were back in your father's farm house."

Friday evening came, and with it the party. Arabella conducted her cousin into the room, and leading her to a quiet old lady in the corner, introduced her, trusting that her awkwardness would not attract general notice. She then went away to attend other guests.

Mr. Stanton entered the room. It chanced that the old lady with whom Hannah was conversing, was an intimate friend of his mother, whom he had not seen for a long time. He went up to her and paid his respects. She introduced Hannah, and the two fell into conversation. The latter had thrown off all her rusticity and responded intelligently. He proposed a promenade—Hannah accepted.

"Good Heavens!" thought Arabella looking round, "if there isn't Hannah walking with Mr. Stanton. How she must be exposing herself."

With the benevolent intention of relieving Mr. Stanton of the infliction, she hastened to them, and devised a pretext for calling Hannah away.

"Indeed," said Mr. Stanton courteously "I must protest against this, I am just about to introduce a friend to your cousin."

"O, he's going to get rid of her in that way," thought Arabella. "Well it'll save me the trouble."

She could not help feeling a little curious to know what friend it was that Hannah was to be introduced to. Judge her surprise when it proved to be a French gentleman, who, she well knew, could scarcely speak a word of English.

"Mr. Stanton is going to have some fun out of her," she thought, half mortified, half desirous of hearing the entertainment that would ensue between the rustic cousin and her Frenchman. Accordingly after a few brief remarks to the gentleman she followed them.

"What will she say?" thought Arabella, uneasily.

in the most natural manner in the world, replied in the same manner.

The conversation was sustained for some time.

"Can she have been deceiving us?" thought the bewildered Arabella.

Just then Mr. Stanton begged Hannah to accept his escort to the piano. She accepted, and performed a brilliant sonnet in admirable style.

"Her touch is superb," said a gentleman to Arabella. Who is she?"

"A cousin of mine—Miss Brown," said Arabella, not without complacency.

"Will you introduce me."

"Certainly."

At length the party was over. As soon as the last guest had gone Arabella's curiosity broke out:

"Why, Hannah, how could you deceive us so? I really thought you were a rustic?"

Hannah's eyes twinkled.

"So I conjectured," said she, "and I wanted to teach you a lesson, that was all. Believe me, cousin, one may live in the country, and not be altogether countrified. If you wish to be convinced, my father has authorized me to give your mother and yourself an invitation to spend a month next summer with us."

"Thank you; I should be delighted to come. I feel that your rebuke is deserved. But is your name really Hannah?"

"It really is, and I dislike it as much as yourself; but I have another name—Jennie—by which I am always called at home."

A year has passed since Cousin Hannah's visit. There have been some changes in that time. Among other things, her name has changed. She writes it now Jennie H. Stanton. Arbella has so much improved from her companionship with her that her husband (she is to be married next week) will be under great obligations to Cousin Hannah.

A Liberian Love Story.

From the Liberian Christian Advocate.

Among the number of recaptured Africans in the United States steamship Niagara there were two young Congoes—Kabendah and Kandah—who became strongly attached to each other on the passage.—During the few weeks that all who landed from that ship remained at Monrovia in the same receptacle this mutual attachment strengthened and matured into the possession and enjoyment valueless if it embraced not the one darling object of its choice.

None but the parties themselves were at all in their secret; and hence when a division had to be made, and some of the company, for many wise reasons, must go to other portions of the republic, the young man Kabendah was selected to go to Bassa When made acquainted with this determination so as to himself, he manifested extreme reluctance, and begged to be permitted to stay where he then was. But those having authority in the matter, in the absence of any special reason, insisted that he must go. He went.

The secret soon got out. On reaching Bassa, this hitherto lively and promising young man Congo was down-hearted, refused to wash or eat, and, neglecting the personal attention common to his tribe, grew wan, poor, and soon fell sick replying to those who spoke with him on the subject, in a spirit of desperate coolness, "What use he be for me to live? Suppose I no get dat gal I want to die."

In the meantime, manifestations in the Monrovian receptacle, on the part of the one there, showed that Kabendah's love was not misplaced or without compensation in the strong affection of his loving fellow in misfortune and misery——his wildly adored Kandah.

The human appreciations of those who had these children of wrong and suffering under care arranged to save the life of Kabendah, and remove his savage grief, by having him returned to Monrovia. Once more the lovers met. Subsequently, Kandah, not being well, was inquired of by one of the teachers as follows: "What if it should be thought best for you not to marry Kabendah?" Her cool reply looking her teacher full in the face, was: "Well I can die."

The lovers were submitted to no such trial of their affection and tendencies to desperation in the destruction of their own lives. It was agreed upon by the agents that the marriage be immediately celebrated, and in as nearly and Christian style as their own rude and barbarious state would admit of.

We were invited to attend the nuptials, but sickness dashed this mediated pleasure from our lips. On the afternoon of the 17th ult., the successful lovers were joined in matrimony by the Rev. John Seyes.—Everything we are informed, was conducted with much respectability, which while it reflected no little credit on the managers of the matter, without doubt made its impression on the minds of all the witnesses belonging to the company.

Conversion of a Lawyer.

"I," said the speaker, "am a clergyman from Dutchess County. I have been for thirty years connected with the people of my charge. I have seen many deep and powerful revivals of religion. I have witnessed the triumphs of the grace of God in the conversion of a hundreds of souls.—But I think I never felt more joy, more happiness than I now feel. Monday morning, the happiest man ever I saw in all my life. I think I never witnessed such a marked and undoubted triumph of grace. By-law No. ——.

Whereas it is expedient to alter and amend the present "Market By-law," and embody them in one By-law, Be it therefore enacted by the Corporation of the Town of Peterborough,

1. That By-law number 202, and all other By-laws for establishing and regulating a Public Market in the Town of Peterborough, as far as the same subsequently to, and inconsistent with this By-law, be and the same are hereby repealed.

2. That the present Market House and Market Square shall be the "Public Market" for the said Town of Peterborough.

3. That every day in the year shall be a Market day, except Sundays, Good Friday and Christmas days.

4. That on Market days the said Market shall be kept open from seven o'clock in the morning until one o'clock in the afternoon, from the first day of November to the thirty-first day of March inclusive, and during the remainder of the year from five o'clock in the morning until one o'clock in the afternoon, except upon Saturdays, when the said Market shall not be closed until seven o'clock, P. M.

5. That there shall be annually appointed in the month of February a Market Clerk, who shall hold office during the pleasure of the Council, and be paid such a salary as the Council shall by resolution fix. He shall, before he enters upon the duties of his office execute a bond with two good sureties in the sum of $200 to be approved by the Mayor, conditioned for the due performance of his duties, and payment of fees.

Duties of the Clerk.

First. He shall open and close the Market at the hours appointed, and attend at the Market constantly during Market hours, unless prevented by sickness or unavoidable accident, in which case the Council may appoint a person to discharge his duties.

Second. He shall keep a book in which he shall enter the name and residence of every farmer or other person who may bring any of the articles hereinafter mentioned to the Market for sale, together with the quantity and kind of produce.

Third. He shall, under the control and direction of the Mayor and Council, have the care and superintendance of the Market and Market place, and execute and enforce all regulations, orders, and By-laws, for the government of the same.

Fourth. He shall collect all the fees herein required to be paid, and pay the same daily to the Treasurer for the use of the Town.

Fifth. He shall cause the upper and lower parts of the Market Hall to be swept daily after the closing of the Market, also the same to be thoroughly washed and scrubbed once a week, also the grounds of the Market to be swept daily. And all refuse or other matter removed therefrom, and in the winter time, the snow around the Market to be levelled.

Sixth. He shall keep the Weigh House open every Market-day until six P. M.—and keep the scales, weights, and everything connected with the Weigh House in a clean and orderly manner.

Seventh. He shall weigh the different articles that are sold or disposed of in the Market whenever he shall be required, and give a ticket marked the day of the Month, weight of the article, and the initials of his name. He shall also keep a book, in which he shall enter a duplicate of the ticket and amount of fees received, which book shall at all times be open to the inspection of the Council, or any Member thereof.

6. That the public Market of the Town, shall be the only place within the said Town during Market hours, where any agricultural produce, Corn, Grain, (Wheat excepted) Flour, Meal, Grass-seed, Butter, Cheese, Pork, Hams, Bacon, Lard, Poultry, Game, Farm stock, or other animals, whether dead or alive, (hides and skins of all kinds excepted) Hay, Straw, Fodder, and Firewood, brought into Town for sale, shall be offered or exposed to sale, or Marketed in the open air, except as hereinafter specially excepted.

7. That all persons bringing to the Market for sale, any of the articles above enumerated shall be subject to all the provisions of this By-law.

8. That all persons resorting to the said Market with any article or commodity for sale, shall be guided and controlled in the arrangement of their teams, vehicles, or stands, by the Market Clerk, or person acting for him, whose duty it shall be so to place them as to preserve order, and regularity, and to see that all persons, frequenting the said Market conduct themselves in an orderly and proper manner, and if any person or persons are heard to use profane or indecent language, or are known to be guilty of other improper conduct, he shall report the same to the Mayor forthwith, and no person shall thwart, hinder, or molest the said Clerk in the discharge of his duty.

9. That no Farmer, or Gardener, shall be allowed to sell, or offer for sale, any of the articles above enumerated at any place except the public Market, until after the hour of 10 o'clock a. m., and no Huckster until the hour of 12 o'clock, noon.

10. That no person except a Farmer or Gardener, shall without license sell by retail in the public streets, any meat, vegetables, fruit or beverages, or sell in the open air any articles exposed for sale or Marketed.

11. That for every such license there shall be paid to the Treasurer of the Town, the sum of $25 which license shall be issued in the same manner as all other licenses in the said Town, and shall expire on the 1st day of February next after their issue.

12. That no butcher or other person shall sell or expose for sale any flesh meat except pork, in less quantities than by the quarter in any part of the Town of Peterborough, except in the stalls of the Public Market.

13. That no huckster shall by any article of provisions, food or produce, in the said Town for the purpose of selling the same, or any part thereof, until after 10 o'clock noon, nor shall he forestall or engross any of the aforesaid articles provision, food or produce in the Town until after that hour.

14. That no person shall expose or offer for sale within the Town, any tainted or unwholesome meat, poultry, fish, or article of food, and it shall be the duty of the Clerk of the Market to inspect all meats and other articles of provisions so exposed for sale, and if any such meat or other articles of food, shall be found so exposed for sale, the prosecutor the offender before the Mayor or other Magistrate. And it shall be lawful for him under the direction of the Mayor, to seize and destroy the same thereof or cause the same to be destroyed.

15. That all butter, cheese, lard, pork, or other articles of food so found, whether the same have been exposed for sale or not.

16. That the market stalls and standings in the Market shall and under the regulations hereinafter referred, for sale offered for sale by public auction to the highest bidder, or at such price as be fixed from time to time by the Council, and all leases of such stalls and standings shall expire on the first day of the month next, and all leases of such stalls and standings shall not be sold at such annual sale, or disposed of at private sale, for the term of one year from the first day of January following, and the Council may from time to time fix the terms for which the stalls and standings in the Market shall be leased, and the manner in which the same shall be sold, and the Council may from time to time appoint an auctioneer for the purpose of selling the same.

16 That each stall and standing shall be numbered before it is sold, and shall be known by such number, and before any such sale shall be binding on the Town Council the purchaser shall sign a lease of the same, which may be in the following form;

This——day of————I leased from the Town Council stall [or standing] No.—— in the Public Market, to hold the same until the——for the sum of————payable quarterly in advance, subject to all By-laws of the Town of Peterboro', and Market regulations affecting the same.

17 That no person having a stall or standing in the public Market shall underlet or assign it, or place or leave any one in it, under any pretext whatever without the consent of the Council, and any such act shall be a forfeiture of the same, And it shall be the duty of the lessee of every such stall or standing, to keep the same clean and sweet, and no butcher occupying a stall in the Market shall sell meat at any other place, except his stall, Nor shall he sell or expose for sale anything but meat in the same except by consent of the Council.

18 That it shall and may be made lawful for the Mayor of the Town, magistrate acting in his behalf, to issue a warrant directed to any constable of the Town, to seize any butcher's meat in any Market stall or standing for the arrears of rent for the same, And in case such rent shall not be paid within six hours after such seizure and notice thereof, in writing put up in three places in the market, specifying the meat seized, the cause thereof, and the time the same will be offered for sale, such constable shall sell such meat or so much thereof as will satisfy the said rent to the highest bidder, provided always, that it shall not be law for the most of a subsequent lessee of a stall or standing to be seized for the arrears of rent of a previous tenant thereof.

19 That no hukster, or butcher shall sell or expose for sale any of the articles mentioned in section 6th in any place except in the stalls or standings of the public Market, or in such other place as the Council may from time to time appoint.

20 That no butcher or grocer shall on any pretence, directly or indirectly, purchase or contract for, or cause to be purchased or contracted for any kind of meat, provender provisions or produce, before the hour of 10 o'clock of any day, in the public Market.

21 That no butcher or other person, shall keep any dog, or bitch, in or about the Market or places designed for the sale of meat.

22 That no person [except Sheriff, Bailiff, or Constables, in the execution of their duty] shall sell or expose for sale any goods or chattles by auction, except live stock, in the Market or any of the public streets of the Town.

23 That every person offering any article or thing for sale in the Market shall pay the following fees and no more, viz.

Which fees the Clerk of the Market is hereby authorized to demand and receive.

24. That that part of the Market Square lying on the south side of the present Market Hall, shall be the "Cattle Market" for the Town, And no horned cattle, or calves, swine, sheep, horse, mare, or gelding, brought into the Town for sale, shall be sold in any of the public streets or other place in the said Town during Market hours, except such as may be sold by any Licensed Auctioneer upon his own premises, and except aforesaid all such as may be sold by Sheriffs, Bailiffs, or Constables in the execution of their duties.

25. That any person infringing the provisions of this By-law, or any part thereof, shall for each such offence, upon conviction thereof before the Mayor or Magistrate acting in this behalf, be fined a sum of money not to exceed five pounds, with costs, And it shall and may be lawful for the Mayor or Magistrate as aforesaid, to issue his warrant to levy the amount of such fine and costs by distress and sale of the offenders goods and chattels, And in case no sufficient distress to satisfy the amount of fine and costs shall be found, or in default of payment of the same the party convicted thereof may be committed to the Jail of the County of Peterborough, for a period not to exceed twenty-one days.

26. That this By-law shall come into force on the 15th day of September next.

Passed this day of September, 1859.

Runaway Match.

A correspondent of the Woodstock Sentinel, writing over the signature of "One Who Knows," thus relates the sad tale of Canada and Britain. "We spent a few hours of yesterday very much to our disgust in being edified by Mr. Cayley's publication of his views on the subject of Confederation.

"Bribes for the Canada will be large enough, when the vast expense of such bribes is considered, but the price will be small when compared with the sum which the Canadas will be called upon to pay for the privilege of being allowed by Mr. Cayley to be the humble dependencies of a place where the very name of Canada is a by-word and a reproach. Canada, with her vast resources, her boundless territory, her noble rivers, her magnificent lakes, her fertile soil, her healthful climate, her unrivalled facilities for internal communication, her enterprising people, her rising towns, her increasing commerce, her rapidly augmenting population, her reasonable size and malignity, besides other reptiles and insects luxuriating in the rank vegetation of a swampy morass.

"Better far than Canada with its noble woods, magnificent water powers, its beautiful undulating surface of hill and dale—than a land offering no obstacles to railway making except the danger, perhaps of sinking down in the mud, mean; a land where everything the farmer raises, of course sells dear, from the simple fact that there is so little raised, not enough to supply, even the scanty wants of the population.—These are the markets that prevail in Illinois. No mighty forest from which the farmer can draw material to erect necessary buildings for a new farm. Plenty of shaking bogs, however, and ague shaking people.—There is no comparison between the two countries for a new settler to locate himself! No man of industrious habits need be at a loss to acquire a comparative independence in Canada in a very few years, with but very limited means at the outset; while in the prairies of the far west it requires capital to begin with, and the unhealthy climate is a sure passport to a broken constitution or a premature death. Such is the difference of the two countries, and the inquiring emigrant will find my statement strictly true in every particular.

Immigration.

There is perhaps no subject in which the people of the Colonies should feel a deeper interest in than immigration, as on it depends their growth and prosperity. Recent returns show that immigration to this country has all but ceased within the last year.—There must be reasons for this state of things. Let us look for instance at the fact that out of the whole number of emigrants landed on our shores within the last four years nearly two-thirds have merely passed through this country on their way to the United States. That Canada is the best field for the emigrant it needs no argument from us to prove. Why is it then that this Colony has become so unfavorable with the emigrating man? The fact of the matter is that while the American Government has been hard at work planning and scheming the opening of new Territories and States, and establishing emigrant agencies in almost every Town and City in Western Europe, our Government has been sleeping, or what is worse spending months together in useless debating on subjects which do not in the least interest the people of the country.

To assist and encourage immigration is a plank in the platform of American enterprise. The following extract from the prospectus of a Company recently formed for the settlement of English emigrants in the State of Illinois shows how our friends across the line understand the benefits of immigration:—

"Past experience in Illinois has shown that every time the population doubles, the ratio of land quadruples. In the ten years from 1845 to 1855, the population of the State doubled, but the more accessible points have increased in a much greater ratio."

What is true of Illinois in this case is true also of Canada, but no care has been taken by our Government to preserve this great source of gain. Again, see how British emigrants are appreciated as settlers by Americans:

"We say, within a year, begin to look for the arrival of the English emigrants which the speculation will send thither.—They will bring with them not only sufficient means for large enterprises but the practical skill and persistence for carrying such enterprises through; and they will be what our farmers need, practical teachers of that higher farming which is so neglected here. That they will be cordially welcomed to the soil by all whose welcome is worth seeking, there can be no doubt."

Can any one man believe that such strong inducements were held out to those emigrants that they could be persuaded to change the government under which they live and which they love? If by these foreign agencies and secret 'runners' those emigrants have been deluded into the belief of a superiority in the prairie over the forest land, then we say our Government are to blame for not having circulated among those people documents which would have enlightened them, and prevented this wholesale deception.

Mr. McGee, member for Montreal, has done much to open the eyes of Canadians in respect to this important subject, and were such gentlemen as Mr. McGee entrusted with our immigration affairs, some good might soon be expected; but so long as the men who now pompous our government control the country, nothing but ruin will result. If any people were ever justified in rebelling against a government the injured people of Canada are at present.—Thanks for the loyalty of our citizens, for were it otherwise all the powers on earth could not stave the heads of our perjured rulers. What's upstairs is presented:—Our commercial interests ruined, our immigration destroyed and the Colony headed in the midst of a [illegible] which it may never be able to [illegible].

The day of the [illegible] of the Cobia Canoe Club [illegible] September. [illegible] will be [illegible] will be [illegible] both important.

The New Market By-law.

For the information of our readers, and the public generally, we publish to-day the new Market By-law submitted to the Town Council on Monday evening last by Mr. Cooper. We refrain from making any lengthy remarks on it at this stage of the proceedings, but desire simply to lay it before the inhabitants that all may be able to read and judge for themselves. The By-law has received a first reading, but it is probable that some alterations will be made in it when it goes before the Committee of the whole Council. But if passed in any shape it will be a relief, because the present law is so pernicious that any change must be for the better.

The British Shilling.—Great inconvenience is felt from the course the Banks are pursuing with this coin. They refuse to take it for more than 24 cents, thereby causing much annoyance to people in business. In Toronto and many other places the merchants have resolved to take the British shilling for only the same value at which the Banks receive it from them, consequently the coin is at a discount. This movement is rapidly spreading, and if the merchants and people generally in business in this Town do not adopt a similar rule, we will be flooded with this coin in a short time much to the loss of individuals having an amount of it on hand. We recommend that a rule be at once established setting the value at 24 cents. What say the merchants?

The following paragraph from an article in a late Hamilton paper on the half-penny token will be found of interest:

Since the new postage Law came into operation a good deal of inconvenience has been experienced in adapting the copper currency of the Province to the decimal system—many Postmasters refusing to take the half-penny for a cent and insisting upon receiving a penny. It would appear, however, from the 18th Section of the Currency Act of 1853, that the halfpenny is a legal tender for a cent to the amount of one shilling, and the penny for two cents to the same amount; and no Postmaster can refuse to take them at their legal value. The following is the clause of the Act:—

"That the Copper Coins of the United Kingdom shall be lawfully current therein, pass current and be a legal tender in this Province, to the amount of one shilling currency in any one payment, at the following rates, that is to say: the Copper Penny for two Cents, the Copper Half-penny for one Cent, and any other subdivisions of the said Copper Penny for proportionate sums; provided always that any Copper Coins of like weights with those aforesaid respectively, which her Majesty may direct to be struck for that purpose, shall pass current and be a legal tender in this Province, at the like rates and to the like amount in any other payment; and that if such Copper Coins be struck, her Majesty may, if she see fit, declare by Proclamation that the Copper Coins of the United Kingdom shall act be lawful money of this Province after a day to be appointed in such proclamation."

TOWN COUNCIL.

MONDAY, August 22, 1859.

The Council met. 10 present.

A report from the Finance Committe recommending the payment of the following accounts:—Judge Beecher $35, Mather Lane $4, Returning Officers $10, A. S. Fraser $ 19 50c, was read received and adopted.

A report was received from the committee to whom was referred the duty to strike the rate in the pound for the year, recommending 2s 9d in the pound for 1859, which was adopted.

A petition from Thos. Dawson, in reference to the bad state of the street near his door, was referred to committee on streets and bridges.

A communication from Mr. Ferguson, relative to Mrs. Duffield for damages done to her at the south of the Town, was referred to committee on Public Property.

Moved and seconded,—That it be an instruction to the Finance committee, to enquire into the account of Mr. T. Bowie, Liniens Inspector, during the year 1858, and report to this Council.—Carried.

By-law No. ——, a By-law to authorize the Mayor of the Town of Peterborough to raise by way of loan the sum of £2,000 for the purposes therein mentioned, and to issue debentures therefor, was read a first time, moved and seconded, that the by-law be now read a second time.—Carried.

By-law No. ——, a By-law to amend By-law No. 100 regulating hotels and places of public entertainment, was read a first, second, and third time and passed.

Moved by Mr. Hogan, seconded by Mr. Mowbray,—That the sum of £5 be placed in the hands of the Mayor for charitable purposes.—Carried.

The Streets and Bridges committee were instructed to make certain repairs on Water Street.

By-law No. ——, a By-law to alter and amend the present Market By-law, was read a third time.

Moved and seconded,—That 25 copies of the above By-law be printed.—Lost.

Moved by Mr. Heatherton, seconded by Mr. Hogan,—That the Chairman of com. on Railroads be instructed by this Council to call the Com. together at their earliest convenience, and to make it their business to know from Mr. Fowler if he intends to pay the six months interest now due on £30,000 paid him towards the Millbrook Branch, or any part thereof, as this Council is anxious to know the result.—Carried.

The Council then adjourned for two weeks.

Correction.—In our last week's Town Council report a mistake occurred. The motion to place Mr. Fowlie on the Street and Bridge Committee, in place of Mr. Hogan was not carried. Mr. Hogan is still a member of that committee.

Rail Riding! Extraordinary Scene!!

From the Lindsay Herald.

A scene of great violence and of an extraordinary character occured at Lindsay on Friday night last. It appears that a rumour was circulated through the town, that Mr. Peter Marshal had kicked and beaten his wife, and that his inclinations were a little too amorous in a certain quarter. Consequent upon these reports, about eleven o'clock on Friday night, a party of several young men collected in front of Mr. Marshall's store and commenced a sham fight for the purpose of inducing him to leave the shelter of his own roof, their object being to ride him on a rail and to tar and feather him. Failing in getting him out they broke in the door with a long pole, and in other respects did considerable damage, and by the disturbance outside and the clatter of stones on the roof and around the house, they very much alarmed the inmates. Mr. Marshall and his brother were in the house at the time, but they hid themselves and allowed Mrs. Marshall to bear the brunt of the battle, and to fix the diplomatic relations between the besiegers and the besieged. Finally, she stipulated for their departure on her paying them half-a-dollar. They departed leaving the lady the honors she had so nobly won; but false to their treaty they returned again in about twenty-five minutes, and again beseiged the dwelling which they furiously attacked for some time. Mr. Marshal saved himself by flight, but his brother having crawled under an adjoining building, was pulled out; it being found, however, that he was not the object of their wrath, he was suffered to go his own way, which he decided should be under the counter, in the store. At length the "neutral powers" showed an inclination to join in the fray, which had the effect of causing the attacking party to withdraw.

On Tuesday morning the law stepped in as arbitrator. Mr. and Mrs. Marshall and the brother swore positively to Thomas Armstrong, Robert Brooks, and George Hall, having been present on the night in question, and to their having been very prominent in the proceedings. On the other hand, Mr. John Douglas, the constable, stated that he had called upon Mr. Marshall, on the morning following the outrage, and urged upon him the necessity of prosecuting the parties to the outrage; on that occasion the whole of the three parties stated that they could not name a single person, as they had failed to recognise any one of those engaged. The magistrates reserved their decision until this morning. Armstrong left the town before the trial came on. A number of youths were brought up, but nothing could be proved against them.

Brooks and Hall were this morning, fined $20 each and costs.

The Canadian Steamships.

A correspondent of the New York Century, one of the few really good American weekly papers, gives the following account of a trip from Quebec to Liverpool by the Canadian steamer Hungarian, Captain Jones:—

"We left Quebec, July 23, at ten o'clock a.m. The steamer and her accommodations are all that a reasonable man could ask for. The Captain may have many equals but no superiors in his profession. The run down the St. Lawrence, and through the Straits of Belle Isle, was as beautiful as pleasant weather, the grandest scenery and smooth water could make it. In the summer season I wonder that no more passengers take this route, especially ladies, who suffer from sea sickness, as we had one-third of the distance from Quebec to Liverpool of as smooth water as Long Island Sound and much of the distance like the Hudson river, with lofty mountains in the distance, and cultivated farms white houses and villages on the shore. For three hundred miles from the Straits we saw a great many icebergs, some of them resembling high castles, with their white pinnacles towering above our ship, and presenting formidable obstacles to encounter in a dark night. I was surprised at the beautiful alabaster whiteness of the icebergs. Nothing can show a cleaner face, and few objects in nature offer a more sublime spectacle than hundreds of mountains of clear crystal-like icebergs; but, like some mighty intellects, without a bird, warm heart, we admire them at a distance, but with no love for them, or the slightest desire to form a more intimate acquaintance. For three days after we left Quebec, the lady passengers were at the table; but the fourth day brought us into the ocean, when the rolling of the ship rendered the Thompsonian prescription of the elder bark, scraped upwards, entirely superfluous. The seventh day out we had a hard blow. The sea resembled the deep abyss into which Niagara leaps with such sublime and awful grandeur.—As the storm increased, the spirits of the captain rose with it, and at its height he seemed to be in perfect ecstasy. To my inexperienced eye, it looked much as though we were about to make a dive for the lost Atlantic cable; but the Captain's cheerful face, and the song of the sailors, as they pulled the ropes, assured me that they had [illegible] was restored. We made the passage from Quebec to the mouth of the Mersey, seven miles from Liverpool, in nine days and eight hours; but we had to wait some hours for the tide, to come up and get up to the city. The passage was made almost wholly by the powerful the engine, having had little aid from our sails."

FOREIGN SUMMARY.

It is believed the expenses of the Sultan's forthcoming cruise to Egypt will be about £300,000.

Harvesting has already begun in the southern parts of the western states of America, and yields a crop beyond even the most sanguine hopes.

The works on the Russian railways are pushed forward with such activity that there are at present employed nearly 49,000 working-men.

It is pointed out that the terms of peace just signed were shadowed forth in M. Guerronier's French pamphlet, "Napoleon III. and Italy," published some short time ago. The voyage of the Sultan is decided upon. His highness will be accompanied by his sons, Murad and Abdul Aziz, and by Fuad Pacha, minister of foreign affairs. The Sultan will visit Smyrna, Syria, Egypt, and Malta.

Bad accounts of the vine disease continue to be received from Oporto, and, according to a telegram this morning, the vines have suffered considerably in some parts of Spain from rain storms followed by excessive heat.

In the Punjab, last year, five men, one woman, and 293 children were killed; and two men, four women, and 163 children injured by wild animals. Of these animals—tigers, leopards, bears, wolves, and hyenas—834 were destroyed last year.

Amongst the heterogeneous specimens of human nature composing the army of Garibaldi, there are to be found two Indian sepoys and a Chinese. The latter wears his "tail" twisted around the top of his head and his bersaglieri hat stuck on the top by two large gold pins.

Human Sacrifice.—A correspondent of the Times, referring to the death of Bishop Bowen at Sierra Leone, says, "Scarcely a year and a half has elapsed since he relinquished all that is usually held to make life desirable in England to work in Sierra Leone. He took with him his wife, then a bride. The tomb was closed over her and her child, and now the husband and father is reunited to those he loved best on earth.' The writer then asks why Samuel Crowther a negro clergyman who has been made an archdeacon, should not have the episcopate? Bishop Bowen himself desired that this arrangement should be made.

A curious wager has come off in Paris. Old Viscount de L——has just won 3000 francs by playing at billards for thirty-six hours without rest. The Viscount is 72 years of age; his adversary, the Marquis de C——, a much younger man. The conditions including eating and drinking, but always to take place standing. At the end of twelve hours the Marquis gave in, and asked leave to continue with some game to be played sitting. This was acceded to, and piquet to be fixed upon. For twelve hours more the game was kept up, when M. de C——fell asleep, and the Viscount was declared the winner.—Court Journal.

A correspondent of the London Times, writing from Milan, says that when the news of the peace came he saw a young French officer at the Cafe dell' Europa draw his sword after reading the bulletin and break it across the table at which he sat. He heard others, who related the insulting words with which they had been assailed by the populace, sympathizing with the feeling which had dictated those words, and only pleaded their innocence of the transacting of their Sovereigns. The revulsion was so sudden and blasting to the Italians, that in one day five persons were carried to the mad-house, raving maniacs.

Public Feeling in Italy.

The correspondent of the Daily News has been wandering about for a few days amongst those places in the Mantuan province which are still occupied by the French army; and he says that the general conclusion to which the people come is that the peace of Villafranca has rendered Italian matters a great deal worse than they were before the war. This is the general opinion which prevails in Lombardy, and he has found that it is not only shared by the upper classes of Italian society, but it has made its way through the rural population of the country. The Emperor Napoleon is openly blamed, even in conversation with French officers, and when the latter are not present the Imperial name is not very reverentially mentioned. Some of the disputants abuse the English Government heartily, and speak of Lords Derby and Palmerston in the severest terms. This writer, after describing the agitation which prevails in the Romaga and the Duchies, says it is clear, from all that he can learn, that the Italians are resolved not to be again handed over to their former masters like a herd of cattle; and that if the Italian question is not rationally and satisfactorily arranged by a European congress a general revolution of the most bloody character will soon break out in the deceived peninsula. He adds—"do not believe that it will only be the doing of the Mazzinians, Republicans and other fanatics, theorists are quite out of the question. It will be a great revolution in which all classes of society will participate, from the lowest to the highest. It will be a revolution against the petty and cruel governments which still threaten their former subjects. In one word, it will be the rising of a nation, with the object of asserting a sacred right, that of choosing the Government they prefer, and the King they have learned to love and to esteem."

Napoleon and the Press.

The daily press, now that the war is over, and the exciting topics in Parliament are "laid on the shelf," is becoming "stale flat and unprofitable." Louis Napoleon has ceased to be an object of abuse, for he seems to be sincere in his intentions of disarming, and the work has commenced in right earnest in all the principle ports in France. All the sailors who have served five years are to be disbanded, and long furloughs are to be given to many of the privates and small officers of the army.—We hope that this will have the effect of calming the fears which have been raised on this side of the channel, and, moreover that the Press of England will not forget that Frenchmen have national feelings like ourselves. Certain it is that if the Paris newspapers had abused the Sovereign and institutions of this country with half the zeal and continuity with which the leading London journals have done those of France,—a practice in which they have been most slavishly followed by very many of the country papers,—the preservation of peace would have been impossible. Nothing can show more clearly the desire of Louis Napoleon but of being on friendly terms with us—if we will let him—than the equanimity with which he has borne the torrents of abuse which have been poured on his head by the English newspapers, to the great regret of all the leading men in Parliament, with the exception of some old lawyers in the Upper Chamber. Mr. Bright said the other night in the House of Commons that he doubted the nation kept a fleet that, this session, condemned when Parliament was last asked, should evidently refuse to be [illegible] of this there is now no fear. The [illegible] thing has been so overdone that a reaction has set in, and better feelings will, we hope prevail for the future. At the same time we should regret to see the national defences uncared for, if only to calm the fears of the numerous classes who have been really alarmed by the dread of invasion, for the honest, albeit mistaken, convictors of well-meaning people are entitled to respect.——Witness's Times

The late Pierre L'Angelier.

A correspondent of the Glasgow Herald writes:—"I have learned the following circumstances, mentioned by a young gentleman of highly respectable character and connexions who went abroad some months before L'Angelier's death, and has now returned to this country:—About fifteen or eighteen months before L'Angelier's death this gentleman attended a chemistry class along with him—sat next to him in the class—was accustomed to walk home with him after it was dismissed; and was thus on somewhat intimate terms with him.—One day in the class L'Angelier was searching for something in his pockets, and not being able to find it readily, he turned out the whole contents on the seat, and among other things a small paper parcel tied with a string. The string had got loose and one end of the paper had opened a little, so that part of the contents—a whitish-like powder—fell upon the seat. The young gentleman having asked L'Angelier what powder it was, the latter said it was arsenic, and that he had been in the habit of carrying some of it in his pocket ever since he left Jersey. On his companion expressing his surprise that he carried poison in his pocket, and inquiring what use he intended to make of it, L'Angelier replied—'I could or I would use it if anything troubled or annoyed me.'—Of course, his companion at the time regarded this answer as meant for a joke; but he states that L'Angelier was of a peculiar temperament, easily excited, and as easily depressed, and therefore not unlikely to act upon some sudden impulse. The facts above stated may be fully relied on; and no doubt, had they been proved at the trial, would have had a decided influence in favour of the accused."

A Man Shoots his Wife in the Public Street.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.

From the Cincinnati Gazette of Wednesday, 17th

A young man, whose name it appears from papers found on him is Thomas Eugene De Marbais, has had a wife named Blanche living on Plum street above Fifth. From his papers, and from his declaration to the Coroner, we learn that five times has he attempted to kill both himself and his wife.—It would also appear that he married her aware of her abandoned life.

About 11 o'clock last night he called at the house on Plum street and desired to see her. She came down to see him, and he told her he wanted to walk out with her and said he, "I am going to kill you."—She said she wasn't afraid, and they went out.

The next known of them, the Reserve Corps of policemen in the Ninth street station house were startled by two pistol reports at the corner of, Plum and Eighth streets.

They immediately ran to the corner, and there saw De Marbais and Blanche at the door of Brookfield's marble yard. Blanche was sitting up quietly, while he was stretched at full length on the pavement, apparently dead.

Mr. William De Beck of the County Auditor's Office, who accompanied the police, caught a young man by the shoulders, saying: "I've got you, sir." De Marbais spoke up: "There is no one to blame but me. I did it." Policeman McGrew went to Blanche and assisted her to rise. She said, "I came out of the house to die.'—Then she exclaimed in agony, "Oh, my daughter!" Mr. McGrew asked her where her daughter was. She said she was with the Marsh troup and upon being removed, as she was was forthwith to the Ninth street station house, she took off a splendid jet cross, tipped with gold, kissed it, and desired it to be sent to her daughter Adele.

Upon examining them at the station house, it was found that she was shot in the left breast just above the nipple, and that he was shot in the right ear. The policeman took from him two three-inch pocket pistols, of Allan's patent, which he said he had purchased yesterday morning and for this express purpose.

As he was laying in the station house Dr. Carey informed him of the probability of his recovery. He said, "If I live I want you to hang me for this damnable deed—for shooting the wife I loved so well."

They were removed to the hospital, where he said that before they came out of the house they had taken 30 grains of morphine divided into two portions, dissolved in water and drank it.

Blanche is a young woman of beauty and has a sweet countenance. It is thought she is French.

DeMarbais is a younger man of short stature, and we learn is or has been in the negro minstrelsy business.

The following among other letters were found on the person of DeMarbais:—

Cincinnatta, Ohio, Aug. 16, 1859.

My Dear Wife:—Should you survive what is intended as your death blow, I trust you will forgive me for not being a better shot. To my I have loved you would be only to corroborate what all who know me know full well. That I now love better than ever, this fearful step I give as proof. Death in preference to it(s) being said I caused you to live the life you are living. We were happy until it was married by intermeddling would-be friends, both in Philadelphia and this city particularly. I do not wish it to be understood that this letter is in any way or manner to exonerate me in the dreadful tragedy I attempt. It is simply to enlighten the few thousands who are ready to condemn unheard and untried the unfortunate end of this cold world. It is unnecessary here for me to enter into the particulars of how we were met and were married, as the certificate among our papers will certify to. I will simply say we knew and understood the importance of what we were about. When I could get work I worked, and it was my great pleasure to to give you all my earnings, little as they were. True, in the early days of our marriage you were true to me, and like my angel, you never deserted me, through greater misfortunes than want. Now the public of this cold-hearted city refuses me employment, and we are comparitively destitute.

You prefer [here follow the words "No matter," with a mark of erasure through them. Rep.] My dear, dear Blanche, God forgive me. But my death is now above preferable to me than life. Had I known we could and would die happily together. I do love you, my adore you and worship you even now, love, there, four or five hours previous to attempting this last [illegible] drank out of my life. My God! that I was able to [illegible] where you are. I would do it directly. There is [illegible] further I remember your [illegible] time of a man] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to be my friend. [A long flourish follows. Rep.]

The principal cause of my misfortune in this city is now a clerk in the [illegible] there the words with the mark of erasure through them, "[Drug] on Fourth street. His brains ought I have blown out first. First drug store on") finest drug store on 4th street.

"I leave big and the balance of my [illegible] mess to the resource of conscience, which every true man feels when conscious of a mean action. Mean actions, their acts towards me—are and have been, distardly, mean and contemptible. 'Tis not because an individual has erred in early days, that he should be made to suffer. So goes the people of Cincinnati. If a man does wrong once—not like the good Samaritan, help him up again. No, they trample him down and down, and never give him a chance to get a manful.

If I succeed our baggage will amply defray all funeral expenses.

My wife's child is in good hands—unnecessary to mention where she is. Good bye dear mother. Forgive me, sisters dear.—Sisters Clara and Ella, forgive me for taking Blanche away in this manner, but I was so jealous of her that I prefer her dead. [Another long flourish. Rep.]

Thos. E. DeMarbais.

All my family papers, dating back to the year 1094, my mother's marriage certificate and other papers will show for themselves. Adieu to all.

II.

Cincinnatti, Tuesday, Aug. 16, 1859

My Dear Wife Blanche:—I hereby certify that from this day I solemnly promise never to come, go or seek you, wherever you may be, unless at your earnest solicitation.

Your husband until death and after if possible.

Thos. E. DeMarbais.

Ten minutes later,

She tells me if I love her as I should, I would blow her brains out. So I will this very night.

DeMarbais.

P. S.—At half-past two o'clock this morning the physicians thought it possible Blanche might recover, but had no hopes that DeMarbais would.

The Gazette of the next day (18th) says that DeMarbais was born in Baltimore, and that his mother is living in New York where he married Blanche only 18 months ago. She was at the time reputed to be the mistress of a wealthy man in California, who had supported her in luxury and ease for two or three years. DeMarbais was aware of her reputation, we learn, when he married her. Sometime after his marriage he went to Philadelphia, where he was placed on trial for forgery, but was honorably acquitted. Disgusted with Philadelphia, he returned to New York with the intention of removing to the West. In New York he met a person who promised to find him a situation if he would settle in Cincinnati. He accordingly came to Cincinnati about a year ago, and was employed in Scanlon's dr

Harvest Reports.

CODRICH.

Fall wheat, about one third over an average crop, and about one-third more breadth than usual covered. Spring wheat about one-third over an average crop.—The breadth sown in proportion to Fall wheat is as two to one. Oats prove a very abundant crop. Hay very poor.—Potatoes promising—about double the usual breadth planted. Peas a very large crop.

CLINTON.

Fall wheat, a little hurt by early frost; yet averages five bushels per acre more than usual crop, with double usual breadth sown. Spring wheat much cultivated, being on ten acres to one in proportion to Fall wheat.—Promises to yield over double an average crop. Barley good, but not much grown. Oats over an average. Hay very light, badly damaged by spring frost. Of potatoes a larger breadth has been planted.—The crop looks promising there being no appearance of disease. Peas are extensively sowngand yield very large. Rye, Corn and Buckwheat, little sown.

HARPURNAY.

Fall wheat, a smaller breadth than usual sown, and in consequence of severe spring frost, the yield will prove under the average of former years. Spring wheat will yield over an average crop, a very large breadth has been sown in proportion to Fall wheat the extent of acres is as one hundred to one. Barley is grown in large quantities, and proves a good crop. Hay poor. Potatoes are more extensively planted, and promise well. Rye, Corn, Peas and Buckwheat, little cultivated. Grass and Clover seed not much raised. Turnips have more land under crop, and are looking well.

SHAFORTH.

Fall wheat rather over an average; sustained a slight damage from spring frosts, a more limited breadth than usual under crop. Spring wheat 10 to 15 per cent over an average with fifty times the extent under crop than there is of Fall. Rye turns out well, though not much cultivated. Oats average fifty bushels to the acre. Hay extremely light. Of Potatoes, a larger than usual breadth planted, very promising.—Rye, Corn and Buckwheat, limited cultivation. Peas abundant. Timothy and Clover Seed, little known.

CARRONBROOK.

Fall wheat, about an average crop, and very limited breadth sown. Spring wheat staple product will yield one-fifth over the crop of former years. Oats promise well, though not yet sufficiently advanced for the cradle. Potatoes very promising; much larger breadth than usual planted. Rye and Buckwheat none cultivated. Peas, a most abundant crop. Of corn very little sown. No Clover and very little Timothy sown. Fall wheat now cutting. Spring wheat will not be generally cut for two weeks.

MITCHEL.

Fall wheat rendered deficient by spring frost; a larger breadth than usual under crop. Spring wheat pretty largely cultivated in proportion to the fall as about fifteen to one. Oats abundant. Hay a very poor crop. Potatoes have greater breadth and look well. Peas good. Grass Seeds little sown.

TAVISTOCK.

Fall wheat covers one third more breadth than usual, and yields a double crop. Spring wheat about equal quantity as fall, and yield over an average. Barley exhibits a quite full appearance, large quantity sown. Oats most abundant. Hay very poor. Potatoes large breadth in crop—recent rain but promise well. Buckwheat, corn and rye, but little cultivated. Peas double crop. Timothy and Clover seed, large quantity sown.

PLATTVILLE.

Fall wheat about an average, considerably damaged by frost and rust. The large breadth sown, however will more than make up the loss. Spring wheat one-fourth less grown than the fall suffered from rust yet over an average crop. Rye, Corn and Buckwheat little sown. Peas large and very abundant crop. Little grass seed sown.

DUNDAS.

Fall wheat about one-fifth over an average, a large breadth has been sown.—Spring wheat fully one-third more sown than of Fall wheat. Barley a good deal cultivated, and is a good crop. Oats about forty bushels per acre. Hay about half a crop. Potatoes crop very good and a large quantity planted. Rye, Peas and Buckwheat very fair crop. Corn light, suffered from frost. Timothy and Clover seed considerably cultivated, and is a good crop.

BRANTFORD.

Fall wheat over an average, the yield will certainly be 20 bushels to the acre, very little injured by spring frosts, weevil or midge. Spring wheat is over an average not injured. The crop of barley will be large and quality excellent. Oats good crop. Potatoes promising. Not much Rye.—Corn injured to a considerable extent.—Taking the crops as a whole they are the best we have had since 1853.

CALEDONIA.

Fall wheat is under an average, and has been considerably injured by frost and midge. The yield of spring wheat will be good. Barley a good crop, and a considerable quantity raised. Potatoes very promising. Peas, a good crop. Hay turns out a very poor crop.

CANFIELD.

Fall wheat will average about twelve bushels to the acre; injured considerably by the spring frosts. Spring wheat about an average crop. Barley looks well and will yield an average crop. Potatoes, a fair crop in this section, the article is slightly injured by frost. Peas will be an average crop. Hay is very light.

DUNVILLE.

Fall wheat will be one-fourth less than an average crop; very considerably injured by the spring frosts and midge. Spring wheat looks most favorable; about one third more sown than Fall wheat. Barley never looked better—a large area sown. Hay is only half a crop. Potatoes very promising, though the usual breadth planted. Rye, Corn, and Buckwheat promises well.

POINT EDIE.

Fall wheat will be 60 per cent under an average crop; very little sown this year.—Spring wheat in better condition; has been injured by frost and latterly by drought. Barley will be over an average, and the area sown is large. Oats [illegible] Potatoes very promising, [illegible] average crop. Hay, a poor [illegible] Peas and Buckwheat [illegible] Corn [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Y PATENT NOT EXTENDED.

A recent writer in "Like the poet we [illegible] the Agriculturist is a brilliant [illegible] There is a good deal of truth in the question, reader. Seldom do we find a good farmer who is such on the result of an education—but rather of his own absorbing contemplations. It is estimated that the education received at schools that confer eminent [illegible] to-day no larger as such school—nor yet is in the want of education that qualified men to discard agriculture, but it is rather the result of early direction, or the encouragement of predispositions that might have been evinced in the youngster. The fact is, a man becomes a good farmer in this country by virtue of the power that is in him. He educates himself; is obliged to depend, upon his own judgment, and the exercise gives him self-reliance and confidence.

No, it is nothing but necessity and a love of the profession makes men good, successful farmers. It must be in born and in-bred. The mind of the child is to the fact let that ever fell to any of mankind—who ever [illegible] nothing in the business but drudgery, and regards himself inferior in position and character to those of other professions because he is a farmer, scarcely deserves to be happy. We must respect ourselves and our professions, fellow-farmers, if we would be respected, and we must make an effort to [illegible] schools for our children that shall qualify them to take our places. And remember, that if we rely for government to enhance a private, the next generation will be ignorant as ourselves.—Practical Farmer.

THE ENGLISH OIL

The London Free Press learns that Professor Croft has succeeded in discovering the natural oil found in the County of Lambton. His illuminating qualities are excellent when used on ascertainable effects. That remained, no obstacle remains to its use, and the proprietor, Mr. Williams, has already secured some 30,000 gallons in its crude state, it is believed that it will soon be on sale. It is estimated that the supply will be amply sufficient for the wants of all the consumers in the colony, and will form an item of domestic manufacture of no small kind.

KENNEDY FOR THE CURCULIO.

The New York Observer publishes the following receipt:—"To one pound of [illegible] add four ounces of flour of sulphur. Mix thoroughly, and dissolve in about two gallons of water.

To one half peck of quick lime, add [illegible] gallons of water, and stir well together. When fully settled pour off the transparent lime water, and add to the soap and sulphur mixture.

Add to the same, also, say four gallons of tolerably strong tobacco water.

Apply this mixture, when thus incorporated, with a garden syringe, to your plum and other fruit trees, so that the foliage should be well drenched. If no rains succeed for three weeks, one application will be sufficient. Should frequent rains occur, the mixture should be again applied until the stones of the fruit becomes hardened, when the season of the curculio's ravages [illegible]

FUNERALS FURNISHED.

Selected Poetry.

A Poor Man's Wife.

Her dainty hand nestled in mine, rich and white,
And limbed no trembling dove:
And it twinkled about me, a jewel light,
As she garnished a feast of love:
'Twas the queenliest hand in all lady-land,
And she was a poor man's wife!
O, little you'd think how that small white hand
Could dare in the battle of life.

Her heart it may beat as maiden's might be,
But hath climbed to heroic height,
And burned like a shield in defence of me,
On the rarest field of fight.
And, startling as fire, it hath often flashed up
In the eye, the good heart and rare;
As she drank down her half of our bitterest cup,
And taught me how to bear.

Her sweet eyes that seemed, with their smile sublime,
Made to look me and light me to heaven,
They have triumph'd through bitter tears many a time
Since their love to my life was given:
And the maiden-meek voice of the womanly wife
Still bringeth the heavens nigher;
For it rings like the voice of God over my life,
Aye bidding me climb up higher.

I hardly dared think it was human, when
I first looked in her yearning face;
For it shone as the heavens had opened then,
And clad it with glory and grace!
But dearer its light of healing grew
In our dark and desolate day,
As the rainbow, when heaven hath no break of blue
Smileth the storm away.

In her worshipful presence transfigured I stand,
And the poor man's English home
She lights with the beauty of Greece the grand,
And the glory of Regallest Rome.

Confessions of a Bashful Man.

Yes, there's no denying the fact, I am a bashful man! Don't tell me about bestowing 'the tears of pity" on the blind, and the deaf, and the maimed—the human race had a great deal better save a little of their sympathy for bashful people. I'm sure they need it a great deal more!

Talk about the Spanish Inquisition! don't I go through a Spanish Inquisition whenever I put my nose inside of a drawing-room! Don't every drop of blood in my body concentrate in the tip of my ears whenever I'm introduced to a lady? Don't I always feel a mad desire to get under the sofa, or into a table-drawer, whenever a pretty girl speaks to me? and don't I make a regular business of stepping on poodle dogs' tails, and sitting down on cats, and knocking over work-baskets, whenever I'm in company with curls and bright eyes? I've wished a thousand times I could kick myself down stairs; I'm sure it would do me good!

There is Miss Hopkins across the street, with a dozen small parcels peeping out of her reticule. I see how it is—she has been shopping to buy those white satin gimcracks and things that all women revel in when they get married. Don't see why she must needs come down my street though unless it is for the sole purpose of aggravating me!

I met that girl at a soiree, six months ago, and surrendered at discretion during the first five minutes. She had on a pink silk dress, all ribbons and roses, and a cluster of pink-acacia in her brown curls, and the prettiest little white satin shoes you ever set eyes on. And then her glorious black eyes, and her peach-blossom complexion and the little round ripe mouth that set one to thinking about scarlet verbenas and white strawberries, and all manner of distracting things. The minute Tom Maynard introduced us I knew I was done for completely.

Well, we danced together, and we sat down at the close of the redown in a cozy littledcove to rest while she played with her fan, and I beat my brains to think of something to say. O! the agonies of being bashful! Tom Maynard would have said it thousand gallant things in the time that I sat there staring bridewly at my boot-tips andlooperately fishing for an idea. I knew I was making a fool of myself, and that was thevorst of it!

How very warm it is this evening,' said Miss Alice.

Yis, ma'am,' said I, colouring up like a pe.

' I am so tired with that last dance,' she ntinued.

' I think I know that to my, to said nothg, and twirled my thumbs around. She looked a moment and then resumed, putting the violets-ers from her bouquet.

' Don't you admire flowers, Mr. Hart?'

' Yes, Miss. A—I—' I fell to work with the mad idea of saying something about herself forever, but got no further-ed and confused that I lost the beginning and end of my sentence-ence and went floundering somewhere into empty space! So I stuck to commonplace matters by bursting into a profuse perspiration and remaining silent.

' I wonder what the next dance will be,' she said at length.

' A polka, I think,' interjected I.

' O, I am so glad! I think the polka is divine."

And Miss Hopkins looked smilingly at me, as it expectant that I would of course beseech the honor of her hand. The very idea of a po ka with Alice was rapture to me, but while I was mustering up a polite speech on the occasion, that rascal, Tom Maynard came up, declared he was like a flower dying for a kindly beam of his sun, and asked her if she would make him happy with a polka.

Alice looked round to me. ' I should be delighted,' she said, ' but——'

'—I was just going,' fibbed I, blushing to the very roots of my hair, but at that point speech deserted me.

' Perpetual bliss points of the law,' said Tom, bowing ceremoniously to me, and offering his arm to Alice, under my very nose.

Was what was the reason I couldn't have the self-possession that delicious fellow has? Why could I have given Tom odds, and licked him out of his boots? Simply because I was a bashful man! There I was, a gawky fool, standing like a post and looking as if Tom—could collect, while Tom looked—cent, and with every external advantage except that of brazen impudence, in which he clearly excelled.

I went home in a state of semi-delirium and dreamed of Alice all night long. For six months I sent her a bouquet every morning, for which I rewarded the establishment of every florist in the town. Good gracious! to think of the amount of sentiment I despatched in the shape of roses, heartsease, geraniums, and japonicas. I became maudlin over ' the emblems of Flora,' and wrote any amount of doggerel verses ' To Alice,' which I never mustered courage to send. It would only be a useless aggravation to commemorate the tight shoes I wore, and the horrible quantity of blushing, stammering, and distress of mind I went through in the course of my morning calls. Every day I firmly resolved to declare my love, and every day my courage failed me.

One day, as I sat sheepishly in the parlour waiting for Alice to appear, I overheard her talking to her sister in the next room.

' It's that provoking Hart,' she said pettishly. ' I've a great mind not to go in at all.'

' Why, I thought you liked him so much better than you did Tom!'

' Well, so I do; only you must confess it isn't very pleasant to be obliged to do all the talking yourself, while a young gentleman sits opposite blushing and pulling out all the ten fingers of his kid gloves in succession.'

' O, its only bashfulness,' said her sister, laughing. ' He'll get over it!'

' Well, I wish he'd propose, if he's going to,' said Alice. ' I certainly do like him better than Tom, but I can't wait until I am an old maid for him to get over being bashful!'

Here the colloquy ceased, and Alice tripped into the parlour, all smiles and radiance. My heart beat a perfect reveille and I inwardly resolved immediately to propose and secure the lovely prize. At length, after an unusual degree of awkwardness and embarrassment I burst out—

' Miss Alice——'

' Well, Mr. Hart,' said Alice sweetly.

I am sure that at that moment I experienced the agonising sensations of a man just about to be hanged. I couldn't for the life of me, think what to say next. At length I stuttered out—

" Don't—don't you think we shall have rain?"

She said she thought it extremely probable, and a second long silence ensued.—

' I will do it this time,' I inwardly ejaculated.

' Alice!' I said softly, blushing at my own timidity.

She looked up, timidly, and evidently thought I was about to speak his mind! I felt like the wretch who has just pulled the string of a shower bath.

' Well!' said Alice in a tender intonation, as if to give me a hint to proceed. I was in a cold sweat, and felt sick and faint. I wished myself in Labrador, or Switzerland, or anywhere, but in worthy Aldermam Hopkin's parlour.

' Good morning,' said I, seizing my hat, and rushing precipitately from the room, with a face like molten fire.

' I will do it to-morrow,' I exclaimed, when I found myself safe in my own room at home, ' I certainly will have it over with to-morrow.'

I spent half the night in composing a graceful form of declaration, and then wrote it down on a piece of paper and committed it to memory. I practised going down on my knees in a picturesque attitude all the morning, and then, armed with a prodigious bouquet, (behind which I proposed to retreat in case of discomfiture,) I set out for the mansion of the Aldermam.

Just as I wen't trembling and palpitating up to the steps, Tom Maynard came smiling down.

" I'm the happiest fellow in the world, Hart!" he said joyously as he passed me.

At this moment Alice's sister came to the door to answer the ring at the bell.

' Is Miss Alice at home?' said I, modestly, with my eyes just above the top of my bouquet.

' Yes, I believe so,' said Miss Hopkins, ' stratingly, but—but—she's engaged!'

' Engaged!' said I, turning pale.

' Ah! Mr. Maynard!' said the young lady laughing, as she quietly shut the door in my face bouquet and all!

Since writing the above, Tom has actually had the impudence to ask me to be his groomsman!

Now I want to know what's to be done. I hear of water-cure establishments, and homœopathic establishments, and establishments for the cure of stammering, but why isn't there any establishments for the treatment of bashful men! It ought to be encouraged by government, for it is a terrible [illegible] and all for want of courage to pop the question! What am I to do!

Eight Children at a Birth!

Johnson, Trumbull Co. O. Aug., 6, 1859.

On the 2nd of August, Mrs. Timothy Bradley gave birth to eight children—three boys and five girls! They are all living and are healthy, but quite small. Mr. B.'s family is fast increasing. He was married six years ago to Eunice Mowery, who weighed 273 pounds on the day of their marriage. She has given birth to two pair of twins, and now eight more, making twelve children in six years. It seems strange, but nevertheless is true, Mrs B. was a twin of three, her mother and father both being twins, and her grand-mother the mother of five pairs of twins. Mrs. B. has nursed her boys after noted and distinguished men: One after the Hon. Joshua R. Giddings, who gave her a splendid gold medal; one after the Rev. Hon. Elijah Chapin, who gave her a deed of fifty acres of land, and the other after James Johnson, Esq., who gave her a town. Mr. Bradley says it is gratifying to John-ston, for the neighbors have chosen the name Timothy for their boys. Mrs. B. is a poor, industrious lady, but says as well as possible, and has raised up all the children while he is able to work.—N. Y. Tribune.

VICARIOUS PUNISHMENT.

This is the term applied to such punishment as that which Christ bore when he suffered on the cross, the just for the unjust. You do not quite know what it means do you? I think I hear you say, " Oh, we do not want to know what such long words mean;—we want to read something very pretty!"

But stop a minute;—I have a story to tell.

It was a sunny summer afternoon; a lazy breeze stole through the windows of a little hot district school house, lifting the white curtains, and rustling the leaves of the copy-books that lay open on all desks.—Thirty or forty scholars of all ages were bending over their writing, quiet and busy; the voice of the master, as he paused about among the writers, was the only sound.—But though so silent, this little light hot school-room has its heroes and heroines as certainly as the wider sphere of life.

The bell rings for the writing to be laid by; and now comes the last exercise of the day, the spelling in which nearly all the school join. At the head of the class is a delicate little girl in a blue dress, whose bright eyes and attentive air show that she prizes her place, and means to keep it.

Presently a word which had passed all the lower end of the class, came to Eunice The word was privilege. " P-r-i-v, priv—i—l-e-g-e, privilege," spelt Eunice. But the teacher, vexed with the mistakes of the other end of the class, misunderstood and passed it. The little girl looked amazed, the bright color came into her cheeks, and she listened eagerly to the next person, who spelt it again as she had done.

" Right," said the teacher; take your place."

' I spelt it so," whispered Eunice partly to herself; the tears springing to her eyes as she passed down. But, too timid to speak to the master, she remained in her place, and determining soon to get up again. But her trials were not yet over.

Many experiments had been tried in the schoolto keep out that arch enemy of all teachers—Whisper. At last th the following plan was adopted:—The first whisperer was stood upon the floor in front of the teacher's desk. Here he acted as a monitor; as soon as he detected another he took his seat, and the next offender kept a sharp look-out to find some one to take his place; for at the close of the school, the scholar who had the whisperer's place was punished very severely—so the school phrase was, " took a feeling." This plan appeared to operate very well; every one dreaded being found last on the floor; but though it succeed so orderly school many of the parents and scholars disputed its justice.

The boy who was on the floor when Eunice lost her place, was an unruly, surly fellow, who had smarted for his faults often before; and as school drew near its close he began to tremble. The instant Eunice's whispered complaint reached his ear, his face brightened up; he was safe now.—And when the class was dismissed he said, " Eunice whispered, sir."

Eunice rose, and in a trembling voice related what she had said; but the teacher saw no excuse in it, and she was called to take the place of the ungenerous boy who had told of her.

Books had been put away, and the waiting school looked on in sorrowfulness as Eunice left her seat to take the dreaded punishment. She was one of the best scholars; bright, faithful, sweet-tempered, and a general favorite. Every one felt that it was unjust; and many angry glances were cast at the boy who was mean enough to get a little girl whipped. Overcome with shame and fear, she stood by the side of the desk crying bitterly, while the teacher was preparing to inflict the punishment.

At this moment a tall boy stepped out of his seat, and going to the desk said:

" Are you going to whip Eunice, sir?"

" Yes; I never break my rules!" the teacher answered.

" I will not see her whipped!" said the boy in an excited voice; " there is not a boy here but that one, that would see her whipped! Whip me, sir, and keep your rules, if you must, but don't touch this little girl!"

The speaker paused; the school looked on, tearfully.

" Do you mean to say you will take her punishment?" asked the teacher.

" I do, sir," was the bold reply.

The sobbing little girl was sent to her seat, and without finishing her friend stood and received the punishment that was to have fallen on her. The school was dismissed, and the boys paid him in admiring looks for a terrible [illegible] but he had saved her from the greatest shame and suffering.

I said the little school had its heroes—and the two were of them. Do you think this conduct admirable?

And was this vicarious punishment? It was;—one suffering from his own free will the punishment that was to have been borne by another.

You see—do you not?—that this is just what he did who bore our sins in his own body, on the tree—the Saviour of men.—What he suffered we cannot know in this life; but God laid on him the iniquity of us all, which he willingly bore, to save us from eternal shame and misery. With his stripes we are healed. How great the gratitude each of us owes such a friend.

" Love so amazing, so divine, Demands my soul, my life, my all."

A Heroine.

Mrs. Franklin the second wife of the philosopher, was a brave-hearted woman, inured to privations and trials. Her first husband died in the wilderness of Wyoming, and left her with a child, a boy of tender age, very near his own age. The latter married Miss Read, of Philadelphia, and brought her to the home of her husband, a log cabin, in the midst of the wilderness. Here, in a rude cabin, they lived for years, exposed to the attacks of the savages. They kept the old

Tannahill and the Ettrick Shepherd.

The following letter, says the N. B. Mail gives a description of a meeting between Robert Tannahill, the sweet lyrist of Paisley, and James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd. The writer was one of the company present at the interview of the two bards and is now fourscore years of age. The letter is addressed to Mr. Porteous of the Gila gow Post-Office:

" Dear Sir,—The proverb says, ' Auld folks are twice weans,' so, like the schoolboy, I rule the paper to guide my feeble hand and obscure vision. The effusion of Tannahill's, ' I'll five frien's,' originated in this: A part of the Argyle militia band under Clark, was ordered to attend the October gathering at Inveraray Castle.—Clark, on his return, stopt a few days at Paisley [his native place], hence fra the hall o' Argyle. I was accidently in Paisley that day, and calling at Tannahill's house, was informed of the meeting. I found out the nest, and like birds o' a feather, gregarious, I was fixed. It was a harmonious and social meeting. Some time after this I was in Paisley and spent the evening with Tannahill alone [as was often the case]. It was late, and so dark that he would not allow me to take the road, but insisted on my taking a share of his bed. I did so; and next morning after breakfast, and at parting, he saw at a distance Smith & Stuart coming in our direction with three strange gentlemen. He said, ' There is something in the wind;' and wished me to stop and see. We kept out of their sight, and saw them enter a public house near to his place. In a short time he was sent for. He desired me to wait and he would let me know. He came for me; and on entering the company he introduced me direct to Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd. Being so sudden and unexpected I was for a moment stunned. The other two gentlemen, having business in Glasgow left Hog., promising to have a ticket for him by the evening coach with them to Edinburgh. We then went down town, as Hogg wished to see Mr. Blaikie, the engraver, an old acquaintance, and a musical enthusiast, a good voice-leader, played several instruments, and succeeded R. A. Smith in conducting the music of the Abbey Church. The forces were now collected, and such a convivial meeting I never beheld. Hogg was enraptured with our company, and it was a treat to see the friendship of the two bards. The contrast of the two was striking—the one lively, healthy, and off-hand; the other quiet, delicate, and unassuming. The only regret felt by all was the limitation of time. We were conveyed on the road till necessity urged a parting. Soon after this Hogg spied an empty coal cart lolling on the road, and asked me if we might try to get it to drive us in. I agreed. and Hogg called out, ' My lad, are you going me to Glasgow?'—' Ay, man.'—' Will you gie us a smart drive in, and we'll pay you for't?'—' O ay, man.' In we went, and at the half-way house primed him with half-a-mutchkin, and galloped to the keystone of the Broomielaw Bridge, where we came off, Hogg saying, it would not do to be seen galloping through the streets of Glasgow in a coal cart. We hurried on to the Tontine; the coach had waited five minutes, and was just starting. When we were observed running it stopt—we shook hands, and in an instant all disappeared in the hollow of the Gallowgate. The gentlemen had been on a tour in the Highlands, and came round by Ettrick purposely to see Robert Tannahill.

" In finishing this perusal, I add to my inquisitive pa, obedients asked, poetry but if you can read it, you must just put up with it, as genius and hyperaes says that imperfections and blunders may be expected at fourscore.—Your friend, Jas. Barr."

A Summer Shower.

" Summer and winter; spring time and harvest, sunshine and storm, cold and heat, frozen heart-spring with promise, and autumn with fulfilment. And so we go! infancy, youth, prime, age,—and there is an end to man on earth. Happy he whose infancy has been protected,—whose youth has been teachable and obedient,—whose prime, useful and delightful,—and whose age is serene and prayerful in the contemplation of a good, virtuous, God-serving, and man-benefiting career.

Restless, stern, active, and driving as it is, cannot extraction such thoughts as these from a true man's mind. Plunged to the neck in the sea of lively competition, he must make head once in a while, and renew his strength, lest in an hour of weakness a wave of huge temptation should overpower him, and he should sink in misery and obloquy.

A thinking man ought to be [illegible] every man's life-calendar, when he may review the past, and ascertain the general character of his course. Such a review, if the ledger is posted, the balance struck in strength by every one who would thrive in money matters, and the general result known in every man's life and business, and the question answered whether his life is worth any thing in the sight of God and his fellow-men. Let us, then, look every community and be practical, progressive, and happy, and the words peace and morality may themselves ward be united from deliverance.

The Italian People.

The difference of climate, the vicinity of foreigners, the traces of invasions, may have modified the type, altered the accent, and slightly varied the language; still the Italians are the same every where, and the middle class—the elite of every people—think and speak alike from Turin to Naples.—Hand-some, robust, and healthy, when the [illegible] has not destroyed them, or in the field soldiers, the Italians are, besides, the most richly endowed people in Europe. M. de Rayneval, who is on the same to flatter them, admits that they have " intelligent, penetrating, and aptitude for everything." The cultivating of the s. ts is no less natural to them than is the study of the science; their first steps in every path open to human intellect are singularly rapid, and if but too many of them stop before the end is attained, it is because their success is generally barren by deplorable circumstances. In private as well as public affairs, they possess a quick apprehension and sagacity [illegible] to suspicion.—There is no race more ready at making and discovering laws; imitation and jurisprudence [illegible] chief triumphs. The idea of law sprang up in Italy at the time of the foundation of Rome, and it is the richest production of this marvellous soil.—The Italians still possess administrative genius in a high degree. Administration went forth from the midst of them for the conquest of the world, and the greatest administrators known to history, Cæsar and Napoleon, were of Italian origin.—The Roman Question. By E. About.—Translated by H. C. Coape.

A Scottish School.

A group of young children, exceedingly dirty in appearance, was collected round their pedagogue, who was instructing them in the precepts of their sacred book, and Koran. They were seated on the floor, and such an amusing sight they presented!, all bobbing their little shaven heads up and down, and touching their knees with their faces regularly at certain intervals as uniformly as if it were wound up and kept going by clock work, that I could not help betraying my presence and my feeling by a hearty laugh. I was observed at last, however, and the effe t was instantaneous.—They all suddenly pulled up at once, and fixing their little eyes upon me, began to manifest the feeling with which I was regarded by them, by making all sorts of wry contemptuous and ill-natured faces at me. The master neither checked them in this strange manifestation of their breeding, nor made any attempt to do so. He probably rather thought it a very natural and commendable display of the irrepressible aversion which the sight of one who rejects the prophet should excite in their young hearts. He himself gazed with undisguised amazement at the unbelieving Nazarene, at the strange woman, who, with face uncovered, ventured to look boldly on so many 'lords of the creation.' There feeling at length found vent in a general shout of execration. ' The Jew to the dog, and the Christian to the fire,' they all exclaimed at once; and having received this characteristic blessing, I turned my back upon them, and proceeded on my way.—Mrs. Elizabeth Murry

Zurich.

Zurich, the place appointed for holding the Peace Conference at, is the chief town of the canton of the same name, and is pleasantly situated at the northwest extremity of the Lake of Zurich. The city is divided by the River Limmat into nearly two equal parts, of which that on the right is called the Grosse Stadt, and the other the Kleine Stadt. It is one of the cities—Berne and Lucerne being the other two—in which the federal Diet of Switzerland assembles by turn. Zurich has been called the Athens of Switzerland; many valuable books have proceeded from its presses, and it can boast of having given birth to many distinguished men of learning. It is a strong, busy town, one of the most commercial and industrous in all Switzerland, and ranks second in this respect with Geneva, Basle, and St. Gall. The population of the town amounts to about 25,000. Zurich is remarkably remarkable as the place where the reformation commenced in Switzerland, under the guidance and preaching of Ulric [illegible] 1519, and the first entire version of the [illegible] Bible Coverdale, was printed here in 1535. Many English Protestants banished by the persecutions of the reign of Queen Mary found in this town a welcome reception during their exil. One of the most pleasant features about Zurich (says Murray) [illegible] the new Esplanade, now included in the new fortifications, now converted into the New Garden, which is prettily laid out in walks and shrubberies, and opened to the public without restriction, a privilege no abused. It commands a delightful view of the town and lake, and of the distant Alps. Nothing can be more delightful than the view at sunset from this point, extending over the sinking and populous shores of the lake to the distant peaks and glaciers of the Alps of Glarus, Uri, and Schwyta, tinged with the most delicate pink by the sinking rays. The most prominent and interesting of the Alpine peaks from this, beginning at the east, are the Scesa in Alpnach, Glarnisch Dodi, Kinzenstock in Glarus, Bolenberg, and Uri Rothstock.

Science, Blondin's competitor for fighting fame, has adopted his comical flourishes. The Rochester Union says: " He has experienced a determination to walk over Genesee Falls which he will do. If he keeps [illegible] completely, he will [illegible] about four inches in width [illegible] and [illegible] a distance of one hundred and [illegible] will be [illegible] above the [illegible] will be a [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

British and Canadian Atlantic Telegraph Company.

We are glad to learn, says the Montreal Gazette, from a private letter by the Globe, that our readers in Canada have passed through the bill to incorporate the British and Canadian Atlantic Telegraph Company, on this side of the Ocean, and the Canadian and British Atlantic Telegraph Company. We further learn that application was to be immediately made to the King of Denmark for permission to carry the wires through the Danish Colonies, and place stations on them. It was believed that an exclusive permission would be obtained. On the Canadian side the cable will be taken to the Labrador coast—we suppose Forteau Bay in the Straits of Belleisle, as soon as possible. Parties in England desired to have this step taken this fall, but it is now clearly too late in the season. The extension of the telegraph wire to Forteau Bay we have for years considered an important work—one that ought ere this be undertaken. It was proposed to the Canadian Parliament some four or five years ago by the Hon. John Young. It will place us one day nearer Europe than Cape Race places New York; and it will have the further advantage over Cape Race, that it will be always certain which Cape Race is not.—We believe, however, that the North Atlantic, with stations in the Danish possessions, will be successful, and if it is, it will supersede the Fortean Bay Station for news for Europe; but this we ought to have as soon as possible, pushing the construction of the greater work. The only dangers apprehended to the proposed line by way of the Danish Colonies, are from icebergs, and we do not think the risk from them is formidable. We hope to see this Atlantic telegraph quietly put in good working order, enlightening the eastern hemisphere on the events of the western, and vice versa before the discussion of the practibility of he other scheme is quite completed.

PROPHECY RESPECTING NAPOLEON III.

The British Standard of last week, in an article on the Emperor of the French, has the following:—Many of our readers will remember how, some thirty years ago, Mr. Hatley Frere figured among the good men who stood forth to offer a few opinions on the subject of prophecy. Mr. Edward Irving, then in his glory, avowed himself the disciple of Mr Frere, whom on prophetic subjects, he proclaimed the most enlightened of mankind. For a long period Mr. Frere withdrew from the world and left the Church, to consider what he had said, coming forth on special occasions. It is somewhat interesting at this distance, and after all that has occurred, to compare his expositions with the events; and this Mr. Frere has enabled us very easily to do by his own recent publication. After giving some extracts the Standard goes on to say: —"The predicted period of the 1260 years of the Church's captivity under Papal Babylon the Great commenced A. D. 533 and terminated A. D. 1792-3. The next period of thirty years was occupied by the pouring out of the first six preparatory vials of wrath upon the Papal nations of the Continent and terminated in September, 1822. The next period of twenty-five years ending A. D. 1848, formed an interval in the series of judgments, an opportunity of repentance granted to the nations before the infliction of the final judgment of the seventh vial, and was occupied accordingly by the work of the Church as described in Rev. xiv. 6-12, warning the nations of that which was about to come upon them. The nations not having repented of their deeds, or heeded the warnings given to them the pouring out of seventh vials of wrath began by the breaking out of the Great Continental Revolution in Paris on Wednesday February 23, 1848. The course of subsequent events is therefore to be traced in the description of the pouring out of this vial, as given in Rev. xvi. 17-21, wherein we read that the great city [Papal Babylon] was divided into three parts; in other words the ten kingdoms of the Papal Roman Empire became consolidated into three.—Louis Napoleon, the successor and representative of Napoleon the Great, having become at the time here anticipated Sovereign of Rome, and so the eighth and last head of the empire, possessing all Italy, which in itself comprises five out of the ten kingdoms or principal territorial divisions of the Roman Empire, retaining France, and obtaining also the kingdoms of Spain and Portugal, will possess in all eight out of the ten kingdoms. Austria, whose Sovereign is designated in Daniel xi. 40 as the King of the South, and there represented as an independent Sovereign, who, in warlike alliance with the King of the North, or the Emperor of Russia, comes against Napoleon only just previously to the last and fatal expedition in which 'he shall come to his end and must necessarily be another of three parts into which the 'Great City' will be divided Great Britain, represented in prophecy as preserved by her Protestant character during the whole period of the pouring out of the seven vials of wrath upon the Papal nations, and until she shrouds herself of that character at the end of the present dispensation, must also necessary constitute the third and remaining part. Another event to follow the revolution of 1848 in the final judgment upon the 'agney or "Great Babylon," which is said in Rev. xvi. 19, at this time to come "in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of His wrath," from which passage the author, in his publication on "the Great Continental Revolution of the year 1847-8,' anticipated, '1st, the spread of the' [then] 'present revolution all over the Continent; and 2ndly, the final fall and overthrow of the Papacy or Babylon the Great." Modern history bears ample witness to the correctness of the first anticipation; every kingdom of Continental Europe having been shaken to its foundations, and Great Britain alone having remained unshaken; and the second anticipation of the fall of the Papacy, or 'Babylon the Great,' was partially fulfilled before the expiration of the year by the Papal Government and the establishment of a republic in Rome, accompanied by the flight of the Pope on November 24, 1848. The author having from the first anticipated a further manifestation of this judgment upon Rome, observing that when the ninth Antichrist, or eight and last head of the Roman Empire, shall [as is thought to be expected] place himself upon the throne of Rome the papal system will be more completely abolished, and the gross and pernicious worship put down." These observations having already extended beyond the author's intentions, he will now hereby observe, that it may be inferred from the above statement that Napoleon III. may obtain the sovereignty of that country, will yet remain an independent Power; that Napoleon having concluded a temporary peace with Austria, will (taking advantage perhaps of some future movement in Spain and Portugal, or by some other means) attack the sovereignty over those kingdoms; that, whatever may be the fighting and war song between Napoleon and the Emperor of Russia, that alliance will be broken, and a new alliance between the Emperors of Austria and Russia, whose joint efforts will, we hope, be more successful in their end and intelligible as to need no further interpretation where the term 'the King of the South' is understood [as in the preceding verse 25] to designate the Emperor of Austria, and 'the King of the North' to designate the Emperor of Russia." What say our readers to these things? If it be recollected that these startling paragraphs were issued by the venerable author, now in the 81st year of his age, nearly a month ago they will acquire a peculiar significance, as Louis Napoleon, in very deed to become the sovereign of Rome and of Italy! He has virtually been the former of nearly ten years, and he has been virtually the master of Italy for some days; and it is as such that he makes a donation of Lombardy to Sardinia, and bestows upon the States general the indefinite something he calls 'Federation." Is he destined at a future day to touch Spain and Italy? That is at least within the limits of possibility. Napoleon has concluded a 'peace' with Austria, and time must be left to show whether it is to be "temporary."

Canadian Reform Clubs.

The alarming condition of Canada at the present time may well create the greatest anxiety amongst politicians of ever class. The deep and growing dissatisfaction felt by the inhabitants of Upper Canada in consequence of the continual ruling of the Lower Provinces over them, and the unjust legislation resulting therefrom, against the unceasing protestations of a large majority of Upper Canadian Representatives in Parliament, has led to a strong expression of public opinion in favor of some change, by which the crying evils complained of may be speedily removed.

It is evident that a change must soon take place to save Canada from irretrievable ruin: in proof of which we need but point to the enormous Provincial debt incurred during the last five years, and to the reckless extravagance of corrupt and imbecile Governments, the members of which, by trickery, and subserviency to one section of the Province, to the great injustice of the other, have been enabled to keep themselves in power against the wishes of a great majority of the people of Western Canada. Taking these facts into serious consideration, and desiring to assist in procuring immediate Reform, organizations have been recently formed having for their basis the following objects:—

1st. Union and amity among all classes of Canadian Reformers, regardless of religious creed or nationality, and the extension of Reform Clubs throughout the Province.

2nd. Opposition to all coalition administrations.

3rd. Reform in the manner of administering the affairs of the Province by securing the accession of a purely Reform Government.

4th. Prevention of bribery, illegal voting and intimidation at elections; the supervision of the registered list of voters; and the return to Parliament of such men as may meet the approval of the Club.

5th. The fostering and inculcation of loyal and patriotic sentiments; the discussion of political subjects, in a calm and deliberate manner; the collection of statistics, and dissemination of sound political views adapted to the condition and wants of the Canadian people.

6th. To assist in securing the freedom of discussion to all parties at general political meetings.

This exactly suits the case of the Town and County of Peterborough. The County is decidedly Reform, but there is a danger in being too slow to move, and a lack of united effort. We hope we will soon be able to chronicle the fact that a Canadian Reform Club has been organized here.—Remember "United we stand," &c.

MUSICAL MELANGE AND ENTERTAINMENT.—This entertainment was decidedly the best we have witnessed in many years. Miss Lavigne has a beautiful soprano voice, and really worthy of the title Prima Donna. Capt. Morton Prince (a man, de guire) is possessed of a high tenor voice, perfectly at ease whether in the by-play or the opera, and throughout a gentleman. It is quite refreshing to hear an good English and Scotch ballads sung that they may be understood, and not have our ears scarified by "the Italian caterwaulings, now all the rage." We can assure those who did not hear these pleasing artistes that they missed a rich treat. It is truly believed that the Captain is travelling—he himself stated, to win a wager; he informs us that after making his tour west, he will return by Canada, when we may again have the pleasure of witnessing the best entertainment Peterboro' has ever seen.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN INDIANS.—Our Town has been lately visited by a Company of Rocky Mountain Indians. They gave two performances in the Town Hall, on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. The exhibitions were positively 'Indian,' and created much interest among the crowd assembled. Portions of the exhibitions they gave, through the assigned troops obtaining and selling up the entitlement of [illegible] Queenboro.

Upper Ann Paperhanging.—The Rev. Mr. Sunday, M. A., will preach next and every subsequent Sabbath, weather permitting, on the great subject of the Court House, at 3 o'clock, p. m.

The Quebec Chronicle states, on good authority, that Prince Alfred, second son of the Prince of Wales will arrive by the next steamer from England. The report is generally believed to be premature, as the Prince of late accounts had entered upon a course of [illegible] at the Edinburgh University.

CRICKET.—The cricket match of the Peterboro' Club to Cobourg is looked forward to with much interest. At a match played between Cobourg and Port Hope on Saturday last, Cobourg won the victory. Should the Peterboro' Club gain the return match, we understand that they propose to challenge Toronto.

The manager of the Branch railway who writes to the Review under the cognomen of 'Peterboro', ought to know that such foul verbiage as that made use of in referring to this journal in his last can never serve sympathy either for himself or his road. The individual he would fain identify with our late remarks on railway matters speaks for himself in another column.

GOOD TEMPLARS.—The Grand Lodge of the I. O. of Good Templars of Canada, assembles in Peterboro' on the 6th of next month. Over 200 representatives are expected to be present at the Session.

We would beg of the farmers not to visit the sins of the few upon the whole of the Town. By punishing the supporters of the Market By-law now in force the stroke falls equally heavy on the enemies of it.—We believe that at the time we write this paragraph not 10 lbs. of butter of this season's make can be had for love or money in the Town. Many are using the remains of their last winter's stock by washing it and fixing it over in such a manner as to cheat the sight, a deception to which the organs of taste and smell will not submit.

Arrival of the "ETNA."

BRITISH PARLIAMENT PROROGUED.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE KING OF PRUSSIA DYING.

DISTURBANCE IN ITALY.

Boston 26th.—The Steamship Etna from Liverpool on the 13th, arrived here at 1.30 this morning.

The Zurich conference has resolved to prolong the Armistice until the ratification of the peace.

The Great Eastern was formally advertised to leave for Portland early in the month of September.

It was reported that the foreign Ambassador of France would refuse to attend the Paris fetes if the colors taken from the enemy were allowed to be carried in the procession.

The Bank of France had gained 67½ million francs during the month of July.—The three per cent of Paris Bourse had declined to 68½.

There was a vague rumor that Prince Napoleon was to be made Sovereign of Tuscany.

The collision between Austrian and Prussian Soldiers at Frankfort was serious, but it is believed no lives were lost.

The King of Prussia was not expected to live.

Spain had resolved to increase her fortifications in Cuba.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Parliament was prorogued on the 13th inst. The Lord Chancellor read the Queen's Speech. She regrets that the interruptions during the session have prevented many important measures from being carried, and hopes for their early consideration at the next session. The war in Italy having been concluded, England had been invited to attend the conference of the great powers, should one be held, but sufficient information on this subject to admit of a definite reply had not been received. She would rejoice at being able to contribute to arrangements for a lasting peace. She hopes that the direct communication with Pekin will prove beneficial. She hopes for a continuance of the existing amicable relations with all Powers and rejoices at the complete suppression of the Indian Rebellion. She promises her serious attention to the internal improvements of India, and gladly assents to Bills providing for naval and Military reserves, and regard permanent national defences as of paramount importance. The remainder of the speech is congratulatory on the prosperity of the nation.

The doing of Parliament on the 12th were not of great intelligence.

The Atlantic Telegraph Co's shares were quoted at £206.

C. W. Wylie has been appointed Envoy Extraordinary to Central America.

The London Daily News says that the strike of the men belonging to the building association was likely to last long.

The London Herald has reason to believe that the grand Duke Constantine on leaving Hyde will pay a visit to the Emperor Napoleon.

London 12th, Evening London Planet City article says the decline in consols was nearly one quarter per cent. and although during the day a slight rally ensued, it was not maintained particularly when it was found that no additional fall had taken place in the French Rentes. The positive range in quotations was from 85¾ to 85½ with fresh symptoms of dulness in the more advanced hours.

FRANCE.

All the troops that are to return to France from Italy have arrived. The Paris correspondent of the London Daily News learns from a good source that the Emperor intends to publish a political amnesty on the 15th. It is expected that it will include Gen. Changarnier, Col. Charas, and even Louis Blanc and Ledru Rollin.

The Constitutionnel in an article on the French Army conveys a threat, considered to be aimed at Great Britain. The writer says that when each there shall have been completed a service of the maritime Transports which will permit the sudden and unexpected corps d'armee on the coasts of the enemies of France or those who may profess of her. The article is generally blamed in Paris.

The Mediterranée Courier of Genoa, states that the Princess who have left their country to take up their residence in Italy have given directions to have their respective states in Savoy and Nice sold, and have already sold their estates in the neighborhood of Chambery.

It is stated in the correspondence of the London Times that Russia and Turkey have signed an offensive and defensive treaty, at Pesth. Division of Moldavia has commenced a large force under his orders, he told Count Rasini the French convoy extraordinary, that he would lead 'Medelpo to the ground" sooner than he would see the Duke restored to power.

The correspondent of the London Times thinks the Emperor of the French desires to come up with no opposition as will render the restoration of the Duke impossible.—The Rulers of Central Italy mistrusting Duke Wurtemberg of the Absolute party, have called the red Republicans to their assistance. The Young Grand Duke of Tuscany was said to be preparing a manifesto offering the Tuscans a represented constitution.

LIVERPOOL MARKETS.

Richardson, Spence, & Co., report the harvest prospects favourable, notwithstanding the changeable weather. Flour was quiet, sales at 10s a 12s 3d. French in sacks had advanced. Wheat dull, holders demand an advance, but it was not obtained Sale of Western Red at 7s 6d a 9s and White at 9s a 9s 6d. Corn was quiet and freely offered. The new Public Buildings at Ottawa.

ADOPTION OF PLANS.

We understand that plans for the new public buildings to be erected at Ottawa have been adopted by the Governor in Council. The first prize of $1,600 for the plan of Parliament buildings has been awarded to Messrs. Fuller & Jones, of this city. To those who have seen the plans it will afford some information to say that the adopted plan bears the motto of Semper Paratus. The second prize of $400 for these buildings was awarded to Messrs. Stent & Co., of Ottawa; their plan bearing the motto Stat nomen in umbris.—The first prize of $1,000 was awarded to some firm for a plan of Departmental Building; and the second prize of $400 to Messrs. Fuller & Jones. The plan of the Governor General's residence, to which was awarded the prize of $400 is that bearing the motto of Odantha, by Messrs. Chamberlain & Storm, of this city; the second prize being awarded to Messrs. Fuller & Jones, who, it will be seen, carried on three prizes; the first for the Parliament building, and the second for each of the other buildings.

The style of the Parliament buildings is akin to the Southern or Italian Gothic, or more properly it is the Gothic adopted to this climate. The style of the adopted plan of Departmental buildings is decorated Gothic. The Parliament buildings are required to be constructed for a sum not exceeding £75,000; and the successful architects are confident that their plan can be carried out for that sum. These buildings will be about 500 feet long, and of irregular width; the central of the seven towers will be 180 feet high, and the body of the building in front about 40 feet, with slanting roofs. The Legislative Halls are placed on each side of the central court—which is about 100 feet by 70, so that it will afford ample light and air—from which they are separated by corridors. They are on the ground floor, and in capacity are each equal to the English House of Lords —95 feet by 45. The plan adopted in the only one in which the Legislative Halls are placed on the ground floor; an advantage so manifest that we may be sure it could not have been overlooked in deciding upon the plans. There are no rooms above the Legislative Halls; and from the plan lighting which is to be adopted there could have been none. The panelled roof admits light during the day, which is in addition to that supplied by the side windows, and at night the artificial light will also descend from above. The light thus given will be of that peculiar soft kind which will render the change from day to night almost imperceptible. This is no doubtful experiment, for this plan of lighting is adopted from that actually in use in the British House of Commons. No gas will be required in the body of the Chambers. The mode of lighting is another advantage peculiar to the plans adopted. The galleries for the accomodation of the public, which are of ample dimensions, do not protrude into the Chambers at all, but are situated over the corridor. This arrangement is a very convenient one, but it was not peculiar to the plans adopted as it was to be found in one of the others. But taking the three things together—the fact that the Legislative Halls are placed on the ground floor, the mode of lighting, from the roof, and the placing of the galleries over the corridors, form an assemblage of convenient arrangements not to be found in any of the other plans. The reporters gallery is placed behind the speaker's chair and may be of any required dimensions. A separate entrance is provided for the reporters, as for the Governor General, and an apartment is provided for them in which to write out their notes. The library building is of circular shape and situated in the rear of the main building, from which it is partially detached, so much as it can be said to be when connected by one story instead of two. It is on the plan of the new library of the British Museum, and is fire-proof.

It will be capable of holding some 300,000 volumes. Between the legislative Halls and the central court there is a corridor, a member's lobby at the end, and another corridor on on the other side. Beyond this, and parallel with the Legislative Halls, are wardrobes, water-closets, &c. The reading rooms are at the end of the Legislative Halls, and the speaker's rooms at the outer corners of the square that encloses the two chambers and the central court. Speaker's and librarian's residences are annexed, as they form no part of the buildings. [illegible] several entrance gates to the [illegible] they may or may not be constructed along with the other buildings. There is a small court in the centre of each wing; the rooms around which will serve for committees, clerks, and other needful purposes. At the further end of central court is a room for his Excellency the Governor General. The post office and telegraph office are placed near the main entrance, over which rises the central tower, and under which carriages may be driven. The members' entrance is on a direct line with the outer corridors to the front. The entrances to the offices and committee rooms are in the centre of the wings, in front of the building; so that there will be no unnecessary contact of different classes of persons whose business will required them to obtain access to the Legislative Buildings. The smoking rooms are in the back part of the buildings, so as the one-storied part that leads from the main library.

The disposition of space on the second story is precisely the same as on the first; there, as in each, is a corridor, in front of the building, which forms the communication between the two chambers and the body of all main building with the library, the only way that [illegible] could be [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] line. There is a genuine and an object, even in the mere trade, that cannot be disregarded. Slaves are employed for the purpose of performing work which their owners expect to turn to their own profit. But Irishmen are sent out of a land, and it idle-ness, which wants their hard muscle to make it what it was designed to be. The land lies waste without them; the money is wasted in exporting them; their lives are wasted in the transport; and, of those who escape the many dangers of the deep, a vast proportion are wasted in perishing for others what is still undone at home. The energy which is expended in performing the pioneer work of the western world, if applied to the purpose of improving their own lands and towns at home, would yield a very different result—grateful to the people themselves, more pleasing to every right-thinking man, and surely more in harmony with the benign philosophy of "goodwill to men," which is so often on our lips. Ye who send the people, by a path which is little better than a succession of pitfalls, to seek misfortune in strange lands, rather put a little more skill in their hands, spades in their hands, and plant them securely on the land from which they spring and to which they cling as to a living part of themselves; and around the many humble hearths which will soon spring into being, as by magic, on the now inhospitable bogs and hillsides of many parts of Ireland will succeed the blessings and praises of those whom you have virtually rescued from destruction, and placed in a position to help themselves. Strong arms, too, and stout hearts will be found there in the time of need to guard you and yours from danger. These are bulwarks behind which a country can afford to smile upon the war-storm of dynasties without concern for her own fate!—Agricultural Review.

From the Hamilton Times

The Upper Canadian journals, in the interest of the government, do not know exactly how to meet the advances of the Right Rev. Prelates of the Roman Catholic Church. They have sagacity enough to understand that the man must indeed be most thoroughly debased by ministerialism who will consent to trail himself of the benefit which the tyrannous edict of the Bishop promises. Besides, it is as yet an undecided point how the Catholic laity will receive the Hildebrand-like manifesto.—Will they bow their necks to the yoke which the priesthood would impose; and admit by their course that they are unworthy of free institutions, unable to appreciate and exercise the duties of citizens? We do not think that they will. We believe that the Rev. gentlemen will have to learn that the day has passed in which the haughty behests of a priesthood were potent to crush down the generous impulse of manhood.—France, Catholic France, would repudiate such an attempt of the Church to repress freedom of thought and action; and surely the Catholics of Upper Canada are beyond the reach of such an antiquated outrage upon human rights and civil duties as these ecclesiastics purpose to carry out. Ministerial journals, therefore, pipe an uncertain tune. They dare not openly approve of the course of the Hierarchy. Their Protestant readers certainly would not stand that. Probably even their Catholics adherents will boldly repudiate it. So they drive about other ecclesiastical bodies having avowed political objects, and trim their sails to see how the wind will blow. But the public will not be slow in discovering whom the movement is intended to aid. It pronounces against Representation by Population. Who have supposed this? The [illegible] denounces our school system. Who passed the Separate School Bill? The Government; and by a disgraceful trick which they can never atone for. It opposes the voluntary principle. Who has pampered the Clergy by public grants? The government. In a manner not to be mistaken the Reform party is condemned by these priests, its fundamental principles are attacked; and the entire course of government, which has ever opposed these principles, is, by inference, sustained; and it is most ungrateful cowardice in the government organs to affect coldness towards such thorough-going partizans.

The Irish Emigrants.

Our publicity for the statements put forth a few weeks ago, in relation to the Irish Revivals, were the "Northern Whig," the Belfast "Vindicator," and the Dublin "Freeman," all papers belonging to protestants. We had no intention or desire to insult the feelings of any class, or sect; but simply to ascertain what, from one point of view, we regard as a social evil. Like all errings and imperfect beings, we may have been mistaken. We desire, however to speak and act justly, and for that reason, we now present what is said, at the other side of the question.

THE IRISH REVIVALS—APPROVAL OF BARON PIGOT.

The following curious statement is made by the "Banner of Ulster," the organ of the Northern Presbyterians:—The Right Hon. Chief Baron Pigot [a Catholic Judge] in sentencing three prisoners last week at the Down Assizes for riot and assault, in connexion with a miserable exhibition of party feeling, took occasion to refer to the religious movements in the North as having extinguished all party animosities, and produced the most wholesome moral results upon the community at large. His Lordship spoke in the most favorable terms of the movement, and expressed a hope that it might extend over the entire country, and influence society to its lowest depth. As this important statement of the judge was delivered shortly before our reporter reached Downpatrick, on the morning of Friday last, we are then unable to present it to our readers in a fuller form. It is altogether a striking and significant testimony to the genuineness of the work, and bears its appropriate lesson of reproof to those Unitarian and Episcopal divines who have shown such an unmeaningly hostility to the movement.

THE REV. C. CHISHOLM, SCOTLAND, ON REVIVALS.

In a discourse on the text, "Worship the Father in spirit and in the truth," delivered on Sunday afternoon, in his own chapel, by the Rev. C. Chisholm, he took occasion at the close, to make some remarks on the subject of religious revivals. He said that, while granting the crying necessity of revival in the Church, he thought that the more quietly the work was prosecuted, the more likely it was to be permanent. He did not approve of excitement opposite to the true sentiment of fear, and thought that the threats of eternal fire and brimstone had now little effect except to make the ignorant grossly profane, and intemperate. Referring to the late revivals in Ireland, he observed that the converts had not been remarkable for honesty, and that the Romish priests had taken advantage of the movement to increase the number of their followers. He had been informed by a gentleman who had visited Ireland, that the converts had been found to be as much addicted to drunkenness as ever. He was not opposed to revivals, but he thought that they should be conducted with propriety and decorum. The holy praise here were, he believed genuine, and were doing good; but he had no great faith in large public meetings of a revival nature; no belief that revivals could be propagated by any mechanical device. And thought that people would improve in religious matters better by reading their bibles, cultivating their minds by varied useful reading, and instructing their households, than by seeking after usual and morbid means of excitement. 'Times of refreshing,' he had no doubt, of the true kind would come, and by the powers of new truth communicated, as well as of deep religious emotion excited, would prepare the world in some measure for the strange and awful times which were manifestly at hand. *Dundee Advertiser. GARIBALDI A YANKEE!

Having printed the claims of the Scotch to Garibaldi, we are only just to the large and respectable Jones family when we print the following from The Petersburg, (Va.) Express, which says:

"Garibaldi is a descendent of John Johnston Jones, who died at his residence in Blandford, about the year 1767. It is a fact that a beautiful young daughter of this Mrs. Jones, eloped from Petersburgh about the year 1753, with an Italian tight-rope dancer named Garibaldi, who, having amassed an immense fortune in this country returned to his own dear native Italy where a large family and unalloied felicity blessed the union between himself and his beautiful young Blandford bribe. Mrs. Garibaldi corresponded with her father until the day of the latter's death, and letters subsequently sent over by the children of Mrs. G. leave but little doubt of the fact that the warrior Garibaldi now in Italy, is a direct descendant of the Jones family, as well and favorable known in Blandford during the first half of the past century."

ADMISSION OF A CANADIAN MINISTER TO A SCOTCH PARISH.

The parish of Trumisgarry, in the island of Lewis, having lately become vacant, the parishioners were anxious to have as their pastor the Rev. Donald McDonald, minister of the parish of Lochiel, in Upper Canada, who had preached in their parish Church, and with whose pulpit supplies they were much pleased. Mr. McDonald had not studied in any of the Divinity Halls in Scotland, and so was ineligible by the strict letter of the law to receive a presentation to a parish in this country. The parishioners memorialized the General Assembly on the subject, and that venerable Court was pleased to appoint a committee to examine Mr. McDonald at to his literary and theological attainments, with power, if they should see fit, to authorise the Presbytery of Uist to proceed with his settlement in Trumisgary. The committee, consisting of the Rev. Dr. Hill, Dr. Leishman, of Govan Dr. Smith of Inverary, Dr. McLeod of Barony, and Mr. Monro of Campsie, examined Mr. McDonald on Monday last, in the Religious Institution Rooms, Glasgow, at considerable length; and we hear the result will be that a Canadian minister will be soon settled as pastor of one of our Scotish parishes.—Scotch Paper.

"GLORY."—A Paris correspondent of the New York Express, speaks as follows of the return of a party of French soldiers from the seat of war:

"How worn they looked, and how wearily they dragged themselves along. Yet with all the sufferings they had undergone, all were happy contented faces. Beneath the tattered, dust covered uniforms and grimy unshaven visages, there was still no mistaking the gay mein of the French trooper. These men had been only slightly wounded. A bit of plaster on a cheek or forehead, a head bound up in rags from which the original colour had long departed a foot hobbling along in a yara stick without a boot to cover it; these were the signs. The poor mutilated creatures who will never march to the field of glory again for the simple reason that they haven't leg to do it, will come straggling home, perhaps if they ever come, a month or two hence many to drag out the remnant of an existence [illegible] government employ, and many more to enter the haven of the disembodied French peasant soldier, the Invalides, where the marshall's baton of their youthful dream is changed into a wooden stump or rude crutch."

The parish of Trumisgarry, in the island of Lewis, having lately become vacant, the parishioners were anxious to have as their pastor the Rev. Donald McDonald, minister of the parish of Lochiel, in Upper Canada, who had preached in their parish Church, and with whose pulpit supplies they were much pleased. Mr. McDonald had not studied in any of the Divinity Halls in Scotland, and so was ineligible by the strict letter of the law to receive a presentation to a parish in this country. The parishioners memorialized the General Assembly on the subject, and that venerable Court was pleased to appoint a committee to examine Mr. McDonald at to his literary and theological attainments, with power, if they should see fit, to authorise the Presbytery of Uist to proceed with his settlement in Trumisgary. The committee, consisting of the Rev. Dr. Hill, Dr. Leishman, of Govan Dr. Smith of Inverary, Dr. McLeod of Barony, and Mr. Monro of Campsie, examined Mr. McDonald on Monday last, in the Religious Institution Rooms, Glasgow, at considerable length; and we hear the result will be that a Canadian minister will be soon settled as pastor of one of our Scotish parishes.—Scotch Paper.

"GLORY."—A Paris correspondent of the New York Express, speaks as follows of the return of a party of French soldiers from the seat of war:

"How worn they looked, and how wearily they dragged themselves along. Yet with all the sufferings they had undergone, all were happy contented faces. Beneath the tattered, dust covered uniforms and grimy unshaven visages, there was still no mistaking the gay mein of the French trooper. These men had been only slightly wounded. A bit of plaster on a cheek or forehead, a head bound up in rags from which the original colour had long departed a foot hobbling along in a yara stick without a boot to cover it; these were the signs. The poor mutilated creatures who will never march to the field of glory again for the simple reason that they haven't leg to do it, will come straggling home, perhaps if they ever come, a month or two hence many to drag out the remnant of an existence [illegible] government employ, and many more to enter the haven of the disembodied French peasant soldier, the Invalides, where the marshall's baton of their youthful dream is changed into a wooden stump or rude crutch."

THE FAULTS OF RAIL.

Some person passing along the track of the Illinois Central Railroad, between Woodland and Hyde Park, and about six miles south of the city, discovered the ghastly evidence that a man had been torn to pieces by the train. the poor fragments mutilated and mangled shockingly, being scattered for rods along the track. The head was found in one place, an arm here, a limb there, one of the feet has not been found at all. From the traces of blood it would appear that the body was dragged some distance before the flying wheels of what must have been the 6.30 train on the Michigan Central Railroad eastward bound on Monday evening. The remains by the boots and portions of the garments, have been identified as those of John Williams, an Englishman by birth, and twenty-three years of age, and resided at Hyde Park, and was a [illegible] working miner on Sunday evening in an intoxicated condition he went home along the track. Near the place at which the body was found. He was seen shortly afterwards by his family lying on the track, and a number of persons in Montreal—Chicago Press and Tribune.

DISCOURAGING ACCOUNTS.

From the St. Joseph Journal, August 16.

In the forenoon of yesterday we received a call from our friend, H. C. Jones, Esq., of Ralls county, who, accompanied by his father, has just returned from the Pike's Peak gold mines, and whose departure for that region we mentioned some weeks since.

The elder Jones, who is an old Californian miner, took out a complete outfit, consisting of some six waggons drawn by oxen, with horses riding horse, and was accompanied by his son H. C., several young men of his neighborhood and three stout, active negro men of his own. After prospecting to his full satisfaction for three months, throughout the various mines, with poor success, in pursuit up as a hopeless undertaking, sold off his supplies, and at once returned to the States.

Mr. J. states that there is great humbuggery practiced out there in regard to sales of claims. A claim is reported sold at $10,000, when the original owner probably never realized a cent. The amount is to be paid in cash taken out of the claim, and if nothing, or only a small amount is taken out, of course the dupe or gets nothing; but on the contrary, if the claim turns out rich, which is very rarely the case, then the purchaser pays the metalmongers.

Our informants estimate the number in the mines, when they left at twenty thousand. There was little or no suffering in the mines, and provisions were plenty, and comparatively cheap. Mr. Jones sold his hooks and sugar at $15 per hundred each and flour at $10. At the time they left there were not more than a dozen loads that were paying, and all of those had been discovered since emigration first started.—There are great hopes of rich diggings being discovered on the western slope of the mountains, but as the country is inhabited by rude and warlike savages, embittered against the whites by the Mormons, and an insurmountable snow capped peaks intervene, the route is not considered impracticable, and no successful attempts to penetrate them have as yet been made.

Our informants fully confirm the awful suffering on the Smoky Hill route to Pike's Peak, and state that that route has been entirely abandoned by returning emigrants. They all now come down the Platte. The Messrs Jones' train came that route. They state that both men and animals suffered very much over the barren, sandy plains intervening between Denver City and the crossing of Platte River, but from the latter place they had fine rains and grass, and a bracing salubrious air.

Waste of Irish Life.

Of the 7,000 and upwards of Irish emigrants who have sailed from Liverpool for the United States this season, the wreck of the Pomona alone consigned nearly 400, or about 5½ per cent. of the whole, to a watery grave. This is waste with a vengeance! and all the more reckless and inexcusable that we have evidences of waste land howling for labor to reclaim them. And when we state that this is not an exceptional instance of such waste, it appears only the more aggravating. In April 1847 the Exmouth left Derry, with 480 passengers, every one of whom was first cousin to the exiled of the Island of Erin, and two large vessels, on a given night, among the following rocks of Sennag, were smashed there all that could be landed of the crew, we believe about four of them, and one. For days the inhabitants assembled to give the last, strangers a quarter, resting-place from the troubled Atlantic could afford; and they communicated with the Londonderry to ascertain the address of the friends of the deceased. But, from the answers received, the only conclusion that could be arrived was, that no emigrants' friends had ever landed on that coast, and the particular clearance taken effect, that all the families and part of the families had entrusted their lives and fortunes to the rotten timbers of the Exmouth, and a number assembled to see several Derry to Liverpool steamers, or to those for Dublin, Belfast, &c. In 1848 nearly 250 passengers sailed in the Ben Nevis for Quebec, and were stopped in the Bay Chaleur by quarantine, and were put on board the Passing Breeze, bound for New York, and were put on board the Passing Breeze, bound for New York, and were put on board the Passing Breeze, bound for New York

Agricultural.

Seven Horned Milkers.

There they come, they milk-maid and the boy. The boy is towing a little boat along the canal, and the maid, who, he full into petticoat and her pink jacket or bodyguard, walks beside him. Now they stop; she brings from the boat her copper milk pots, as bright as gold, and, with a cooing greeting to her dear cows, sets down her little stool on the grass, and begins to milk. The boy, having moored his boat, stands beside her with the spare pail, which is to hold the last pint from each cow; the creamy pint which comes last because it has risen to the top of the udder. Not a drop is left to turn sour and fret the cow. The boy finishes and carries the pails, and moves as if he trod on eggs when conveying the full pails to the boat. When afloat, there is no shaking at all. Smoothly glides the cargo of pails up to the very entrance of the dairy, where the deep jars appropriate to this "meal" of milk are ready—cooled with cold water if it is summer, warmed with hot water if the weather requires it. When the time for churning comes, the Dutch woman takes matters so quietly as hitherto. She softly pours the milk in the jars till she finds therein the due degree of acidity; and then she leisurely pours the whole—cream and milk together—into a prodigiously stout and tall upright churn. She must exert herself, however, if she is to work that plunger. She work it!—not she! She would as soon think of working the mills on the dyke with her own plump hands. No—she has a servant under her to do it. She puts her dog into a wheel which is connected with the plunger, and, as the animal runs round, what a splashing, wolloping, and frizzing is heard from the closed churn! The quiet dairy-maid knows by the changes of the sound how the formation of butter proceeds; when she is quite sure that there is multitudes of flakes floating within, she stops the wheel, releases the dog, turns down the churn upon a large sieve, which is laid over a tub, and obtains a shovelful of butter, in the shape of yellow kernels, while the buttermilk runs off, for benefit of the pigs, or of the household cookery.—Dickens's Household Words.

AGE OF ANIMALS.—A bear rarely exceeds 20 years; a dog lives 20 years; a wolf 20; a fox 14 to 16; lions are long lived—"Pompey" lived to the age of 70. The average of cats is 15 years; a squirrel had here 7 or 8 years.

Selected Poetry.

Sweet Secret.

The world is wild and rough with care,
The people are hurrying to and fro—
We are weary and worn, we sigh with despair—
Where—where shall we go?
Where shall we go to be free from this,
Just for a time to put it by?
Where struggle from out the desperate mass?
Give me rest or else me die!
Is there no spot where violets grow,
Lone and dim, and silent and sweet,
Where flowers that lie in the moss below
Perfume our humble, aching feet?

A dim retreat,
Where very secrecy makes it sweet!
So silent, no sound doth ever come
Of the battling world; only the hum
Of bird wings and the breeze
Sighing its love out to the trees,
As we sigh loves of one another!
To some dim nook in spirit we steal,
Letting the blind world reel:
While we, like children, are lulled to rest
With the soothing sense of a mother's breast.

THE LEFT-HANDED THIEF.

'How many young men have been injured, and perhaps ruined, by false suspicion,' remarked my mercantile friend, as we were conversing upon the subject of the 'panic' a few evenings since. 'Suspicion is the dark. It stabs its victim, and he knows not whence the blow comes. Or, it may be more like the keen frost which seizes upon the ears, and cheeks, or the nose, freezing the flesh and driving back the life-blood, and yet leaving the poor man ignorant of his situation till he comes in contact with heat, and begins to feel the stinging pain. But I believe I never told you of the only time that suspicion of evil was ever fastened upon me. It has nothing in particular to do with the subject under consideration, though it serves to show how merchants sometimes lose money.

'When a mere youth I was placed in the store of Jonas Warton, who was a merchant doing a good business. I was frugal, industrious and faithful, and at the age of twenty-one I was advanced to the post of book-keeper, with a good salary. I had charge of the books and the safe, and all the money left over after banking hours was in my care. I tried to do my duty faithfully, and I think I succeeded. Mr. Warton was a close, methodical man, with a quick eye, and ready understanding of business, and as I fancied he was satisfied I felt much pleased.

'I had been book-keeper a year when I thought my employer's manners towards me began to change. He seemed to treat me more coolly, and, finally, I was sure he watched my movements with distrustful glance. I became nervous and uneasy, for I feared I had offended him. But the thing came to a head at length. One evening when I was alone in the store, engaged in making up my cash account, Mr. Warton came to me with a troubled look, and spoke. His voice was tremulous, and I could see that he was deeply affected.

"'George,' said he, 'I am sorry for the conviction which has been forced upon me. I fear you are not treating me as you should.'

'I managed in spite of my astonishment to ask him what he meant.

"'I fear you are not honest!' was his reply.

'Had a thunderbolt fallen upon me, I could not have been more startled. Not honest!—And there I had been for years, making it my chief aim and study how to serve him most faithfully! I do not remember what I said at first. I only know tears came into my eyes—that my lips trembled—and that my utterance was almost choked. How long had he held such suspicion? I asked him and he told me for more than two months.

"'Good God! You have suspected me then, and still left me in the dark! After serving you so long—after giving to your interests all my energies—after striving for faith and honor that I might win your love and esteem;—to suspect me in secret!—to look upon me as a thief, and yet you not tell me! Oh! I would not have believed it!'

"'Let us talk the matter over calmly,' said the merchant, his old kind tone coming back. He was touched by my agony, and I could see that he was wavering.

"'I felt at first like telling him that he should have done this before; but as he seemed willing to reason now I found no more fault.

"'You have spent considerable money of late,' he began.

"'How?' I asked.

"'Have you not built a house?'

"'Yes, sir—and paid for it too—and have then given my mother a comfortable home.'

'Mr. Warton was staggered for a moment by my frank and telling reply; but pretty soon he said—

"'What did the house cost you?'

"'Just fifteen hundred dollars. My mother owned the land. And I suppose you would know where I got the money.—Yes, the principal we have to settle. I have lived with you six years. The first year you paid me five dollars, and I laid my twenty-five off. The second and third years you gave me a hundred; and of that I laid up fifty dollars a year. The fourth year you made me a clerk and gave me five hundred. My mother was able to lend me that by her little old ten-cornered bit of stocking that your wife so despised. The next three years I laid up a hundred dollars each year. The next year I married. Eight hundred dollars were given me by my father-in-law, and my wife had a little property besides. Then I laid up another hundred dollars each year, and the next year I built my house. My wife's property furnished it, and I have since laid up two hundred dollars each year. I have my cash account here, and also my bank book. The sum of the whole is—'

"'Hold!' said the merchant, as he detected the sorrowful expression upon my countenance, 'you have failed to discover anything.'

"'Alas! I wish I could say so,' I replied. 'I have discovered too much. In the first place, the money has been taken from the safe, and the key left in its proper drawer; and locked up as usual. Also the cash-book has been examined, as a type so many entries has been made. Of the twenty-five dollars, and of the hundred dollars, there is all right. But in the case of the five hundred dollars, and of the fifty dollars, there is all wrong. Those sums have been added, and the figures altered to suit the footing of the book. Also, the cash-book has been examined. Warton entered the store with all my energies of mind centered upon the work before me. There were four clerks, or salesmen, and one boy, besides myself, in constant attendance, and all money received had to pass through my hands. Sometimes I made up my cash account at night and sometimes not until the next morning. In the latter case I generally put the money-drawer into the safe and locked it up. The key to this safe was kept in a small drawer to which there were two keys, one of which I kept, while Mr. Warton kept the other. The only other person who ever had one in the store was Henry Warton, our employer's only son—a youth twenty years of age. He was preparing for college, under a private tutor, but found time to help us when business was driving. He was a kind-hearted, generous fellow, and a strong mutual attachment had grown up between us. At first I thought of getting him to assist me in finding the thief; but as Warton had promised to speak to no one else upon the subject, I concluded to keep silent also.

'That night I counted my money but made no entry of the account. There was three hundred and forty odd dollars. I put it into a new calfskin pocket book—placed that in the money-drawer, and locked the whole up in a safe. On the following morning I found fifty dollars missing! I counted the money over carefully, and was not mistaken. I began to feel unpleasantly. My suspicions took a very nowdecome turn.

'During that day I pondered upon the subject, and finally hit upon the following experiment: When I had locked the safe up for the night, I spread open the knob of the door, and upon the money-drawer, some pale red lead, being careful not to get on enough to be noticed. I had left the cash account open, to be closed up in the morning. When I next opened the safe, all was as I had left it. The next night I fixed the knob in the same manner, and on the morning following I found forty dollars gone!—Upon the calfskin book were finger-marks of the red lead: and when I came to open my cash book I found the same kind of marks there! So I had learned one thing: the thief knew enough to see whether any account had been made of the money before he took it! I felt more unpleasantly than before, for my unwelcome suspicions were being confirmed. There was a peculiarity in the red finger-marks which told me a sad story. Still I wished to try further.

"'For two nights after this the safe remained undisturbed, but on the third night I missed seventy-five dollars; and I had now set my trap more carefully. The red pigment was not only used, but I had put a private mark upon every bill in the drawer. The pocket book and the cash-book were fingered as before, and the marks were clear and distinct.

'When the week was up Mr. Warton came and asked me what I had found.

"'Alas!' he said, on beholding the sorrowful expression upon my countenance, 'you have failed to discover anything.'

"'Alas! I wish I could say so,' I replied. 'I have discovered too much. In the first place, the money has been taken from the safe, and the key left in its proper drawer; and locked up as usual. AN ENGLISH ESTIMATE OF MAZZINI.

An English provincial paper of some influence, draws the following unpromising picture of this Italian:

Prince Metternich is reported to have said 'that had not Austria found a Mazzini she would have been forced to create one.' This man, a lawyer by profession, a Red Republican by choice, and a supporter of despotism by his impracticability, has engaged in, or originated, every conspiracy which has agitated Italy for the last twenty years.—Ever eluding the vigilance of the police, he has long fixed his residence in London, and there organizing the party known by the name of 'Young Italy,' he has sent forth his dupes to a certain defeat and terrible death, while he dwelt in security and emolument. Mazzini is a Republican simply because under a republic alone could he hope to gratify an unlimited ambition. He is a fanatic of the school of Robespierre and Danton; he cares little for Italy but much for Mazzini, and aspires to power, accompanied with plunder, from the conflagration of Europe.

Mazzini has undoubtedly lost the sympathy of the English generally by his complicity, real or suspected, with the attempts to murder the Emperor of the French—a species of crime which no honorable man cannot help frowning upon. The harsh language of the closing sentence, however, is probably unmerited. That he cares little for Italy we are not disposed to believe. The great drawback to Mazzini's personal character is that whether he has really plotted assassinations and hired assassins or not, he has notoriously sympathized with them. And the drawback to his political character is that he is so bound up in his own views as to be really one of the most impracticable men of the age. He would fain make his theories the law for all Italy. If the goal is not to be reached by the path he has marked out, it must remain for ever unattained, and they who seek it in any other way are mercilessly denounced as fools or as traitors to the cause which he assumes to have taken under his special care and direction. Of no consequence in his view is it that his plans have been tried and failed; that his countrymen 'groan, being burdened' and pant for deliverance from their oppressor; that they are driven to the verge of despair and are sick from hope deferred. No weapon that he has not supplied, no leader that he has not approved and appointed, need expect anything but his fierce and vindictive condemnation.

And it is this infirmity of temper, this crotchetiness in his mental constitution, and not any doubt of his patriotism, that has destroyed his influence in Italy. Had he been willing, like Garibaldi, to deal with the question of Italian freedom as a man of practical common sense, and to co-operate with those who were willing to do something, as well as to project schemes, for Italy's liberties, he might have now been a power in the Italian States capable of largely influencing, if not, indeed, of controlling, the destinies of Italy at this critical juncture. As it is he is a cypher, a dead letter, without voice or practical interest in the crisis, writing and printing high-sounding manifestoes, it is true, but without an atom of power to serve his countrymen, and provoking smiles that border closely upon contempt. It is really painful to see such waste of energy united with an egotism and self-will that blind him to the fact that he is injuring rather than serving the cause of his country.

ABROAD FOR NEWS.

In the Toronto correspondence of the New York Times, the following story is told relative to the recent destruction of the Catholic Church in Hamilton. We do not pretend to authenticate the strange narrative.

The Roman Catholic Church at the sister city of Hamilton was burned to the ground a few days since, and rumours are rife as to its cause. There is a great deal of animosity between the French and Irish persons here, and the feud extends to their congregations. The organ in the church here was burned some time ago, and there is not only no doubt that the Irish party did the deed, but the individuals are also pointed out, and so it is in Hamilton, but the perpetrators of the crime are not yet known. There, however, another and a most romantic [illegible] about.

A beautiful girl, the daughter of a most respectable and loving father, deemed it her duty to become a nun and entered one of the preparatory societies of which Roman Catholics will know the name and nature better than I do. One of the conditions of this Society, is, that there shall be preserved not only a strict chastity, but that the address of young men shall be discouraged and their conversation shunned. Lavinia becoming a member from a true love of religion, in the understood the term, one long found her heart too strong for her head.—She met, she loved,—and loving, erred.—The Bishop was told of her fault and of her condition. He commanded her appearance before him, which at first was refused, but at length complied with, under pain of excommunication. But not content with admonishing the frail fair one privately, he summoned her on Sunday before the altar, and there in presence of the congregation, he published her fault to the world, stripped from her her rosary and medals, and put her to open shame. Her father was heart-broken: her lover wrathful. This was on Sunday, as I have said; on Tuesday morning the church was burned down and the lover had eloped.

PUBLIC NOTICE!

BY-LAW No.—

A By-law to authorize the Mayor of the Town of Peterborough to borrow the sum of [illegible] for the purpose of [illegible].

Passed the [illegible] day of [illegible] A. D. 1859.

WHEREAS, the Municipality of the Town of Peterborough, for the year One thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine, [illegible] by-law, passed in pursuance [illegible] and requiring the Treasurer of the said Town, to authorize the Mayor thereof to borrow through the Bank of Montreal, or the Commercial Bank of the Midland District, or the Peterboro Railway Company, the sum of One Hundred Pounds;

And Whereas, the sum of eight hundred and fifty-five pounds, is still required to pay the balance of the said By-law, over the [illegible] connected with the issue of Debentures for the payment of the said work;

And Whereas the sum of three hundred pounds is required to pay the Government for the Lots agreed to be sold to Lamb, at the South end of the Town, and the balance of the Separate Schools;

And Whereas, it is desirable and necessary to expend in gravelling, macadamizing and otherwise improving the streets of the said Town, the sum of eighty hundred and seventy-five pounds.

And Whereas, to carry into effect the said recited objects, it will be necessary for the said Municipality to borrow, to make the said several thousand pounds, in the manner hereinafter mentioned;

And whereas, it will require the sum of three hundred and twenty pounds, to be raised annually by special rate, for the payment of the said loan or debt, and interest as also hereinafter mentioned.

And Whereas, the amount of the whole rateable property of the said Municipality, irrespective of any late increase of the same, and irrespective of any income from said stock or shares in the return of tolls, interest, or dividends, and also irrespective of any income derived from the temporary investment of the said sum of one thousand pounds, all interest as hereinafter mentioned, is the sum of two thousand, according to the last revised Assessment Roll of the said Municipality, being for the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one pounds.

And Whereas, for paying the interest and creating sufficient sinking fund, for paying the said sum of one thousand pounds, all interest as hereinafter mentioned, it will require an equal annual special rate of four pence three eighths of a penny in the pound, in addition to all rates to be levied in each year. By-laws not passed by the Corporation of the Town of Peterborough.

Ist. That it shall be lawful for the said Mayor to cause any number of Debentures to be made for such sums of money as may be required, not less than one hundred pounds each, and in the whole not to exceed the said sum of two thousand pounds, and that the said Debentures shall be sealed with the seal of the said Municipality, be signed by the Mayor, and countersigned by the Clerk.

2nd. That it shall be lawful for the said Mayor to cause any number of Debentures to be made for such sums of money as may be required, not less than one hundred pounds each, and in the whole not to exceed the said sum of two thousand pounds, and that the said Debentures shall be sealed with the seal of the said Municipality, be signed by the Mayor, and countersigned by the Clerk.

3rd. That the said Debentures shall bear interest at and after the rate of six per cent payable on, from the date thereof, which interest shall be payable half yearly, on the first days of April and October respectively, at the office of the Treasurer aforesaid.

4th. That for the purpose of forming a sinking fund for the payment of the said Debentures, and the interest at the rate aforesaid, to become due thereon, an equal special rate of four pence three eighths of a penny in the pound, shall, in addition to all other rates, be raised levied, and collected, in each year upon all the rateable property, in the said Municipality, during the continuance of the said Debentures or any of them.

5th. That for the purpose of taking the votes of the Municipal Electors on this By-law a poll shall be opened according to law in the North Ward in the shop of Hugh Evans on Monday the nineteenth day of September next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and James Lines is hereby nominated to act as Returning Officer, to take the oath in the said Ward. Selected Poetry.

WHERE WOLFE FELL.

A lonely column; few and bare
The words inscribed upon its stone,
Yet it speaks it of the dying chief
Triumphant tales alone!

It tells unfolding glory shed
Upon the hero's parting hour;
Dying beside the boat he led,
To victory and to power!

The trumpet's tone, the battle shout,
All sounds of triumph come again,
As shines the brief inscription out
Upon the storied plain.

The flashing sword, the cannon's roar,
The beating of the wild war drum;
And the last shout "They fly! once more
On fancy's vision come.

And marching round the hero's bed,
With banner's flowing free and fair,
Are seen the host he nobly led
For Britain's glory there.

But years have passed and silence reigns
Where once was heard the battle cheer;
Of all the trophies naught remains—
This, only this, is here.

A broken column! brief, yet high
The eulogy its words convey!
Thus in the triumph hour to die,
Is not a note of earth's decay.

THE CAPTURE OF QUEBEC.

(13th September, 1859.)

The campaign of 1859 was opened with a plan of combined operations by sea and land. Canada was to be invaded at three different points by generals of high talent. The Commander-in-chief, General Amherst undertook the reduction of the forts at Crown Point and Ticonderoga. He was to cross Lake Champlain, and proceeding along the Richelieu, was to reach the St. Lawrence and join the other army before Quebec. The force destined to proceed by sea to Quebec, was under the command of the heroic General Wolfe.—General Prideaux, with another army and a large body of friendly Indians under Sir Wm. Johnson was appointed to reduce Niagara. Wolfe's army amounting to about eight thousand men, was conveyed to the vicinity of Quebec in a fleet of vessels of war and transports, and landed in two divisions on the island of Orleans on the 27th of June. The Marquis de Montcalm made vigorous preparations for defending Quebec. His armed force consisted of about fourteen thousand men, of whom six battalions were regulars, and the remainder well-disciplined Canadian militia with some cavalry and Indians. He ranged these forces from the River St. Charles to the Falls of Montmorency with all the view of opposing the landing of the British.

Wolfe first attempted to force the entrenchment of Montmorency, landing his troops on the shore of the fire from the ships but was gallantly repulsed by the French. In consequence of this repulse he sent despatches to England, stating that he had doubts of being able to reduce Quebec during that campaign. His prospects indeed were not encouraging, the great strength kept up an incessant fire from its almost inaccessible position, bristling with guns, defended by a superior force, and inhabited by a hostile population. Above the city steep banks rendered landing almost impossible; below the country for eight miles was embarrassed by the harbour. A part of the fleet lay above the town and the remainder in the north channel between the Island of Orleans and Montmorency.

Soon after this repulse however Wolfe formed his brave and vigorous spirit, called a council of war, and proposed, it is generally said at the instigation of his second in command, General Townsend, to gain the heights of Abraham behind and above the city, commanding the weakest part of the fortress. The council acceded to this daring proposal, and their heroic commander commenced his preparations, in the meanwhile making such active demonstrations against Montcalm's position that the French still believed it to be his main object.

On the 11th September a great part of the troops landed and marched up the south shore opposite Quebec, forded the river Etchemin, and embarked on board the men of war and transports which lay above the town. On the 12th the ships of war sailed nine miles up the River to Cap Rouge. This feint deceived Montcalm, and he detached Du Bourgneville, who with his army proceeded still further up the river, to prevent English from landing. During the night the English troops dropped silently down the river with the current in boats, and at 2 o'clock in the morning began to land.

It is surprising how the troops contrived to land, as the French had posted sentries along the shore to challenge boats and give the alarm. The first boat was questioned, when Captain Donald McDonald, one of Fraser's Highlanders, who was pretty well acquainted with the French language answered to 'Qui vive?' which is their challenge, 'La France.' When the sentinel replied 'A good Regiment!' the captain replied 'De de Hasse,' which he knew by accident to be one of those commanded by De Bourgainville. The soldier took it for granted that it was an unpaired convoy, and crying 'Pass,' the boats proceeded without further question. One of the sentries soon very thin the rest, running down the water's edge, called out 'Passez vous en tant que nous ne passey pas plus haut?' to which the sentries answered in a soft tone of voice, 'Passez toujours nous connoissons.' This quieted the sentry entirely, and the boats proceeded without further interruption, and landed in the spot now called after Wolfe's Cove.

General Wolfe was one of the first to shore, and on seeing the difficulty of ascending the precipice, observed hastily to Captain McDonald, 'I do not believe I shall see my country at sunrise on the morrow.' Captain McDonald replied, 'I hope not, sir.' Wolfe then repeated the passage in Gray's Elegy, 'The paths of glory lead but to the grave,' and proceeded to the summit.

Montcalm was encamped on the heights of Abraham, and was not aware of the landing of the English army, till he was informed of it by the firing of the sentries. He immediately broke up his camp, and marched with his whole army to attack the English. Wolfe had by this time formed a corps of observation. Before he could concentrate his forces, he advanced with haste and precipitation, and commenced a most gallant attack when within about two hundred and fifty yards of the English line. The English moved forward regularly firing steadily, until within thirty or forty yards of the French, when they gave a general volley which did great execution.—The English had only a light cannon, which sailors had dragged up the heights with ropes. The sabre therefore, and the bayonet decided the day. The agile Scotch Highlanders with their stout claymores served the purpose of cavalry, and the steady fire of the English Fusiliers compensated in some degree for the want of artillery.

The heroism of Montcalm was as conspicuous as that of his illustrious opponent; both headed their men; both rushed with eagerness where the battle raged most fiercely. Often by their personal prowess and example did they change the fortune of the moment. Both were repeatedly wounded, but still fought with enthusiasm. And at last both these gallant commanders fell mortally wounded, whilst advancing to the last deadly charge at the head of their respective columns.

Wolfe was wounded in the wrist. He immediately wrapped a handkerchief round his arm, and putting himself at the head of his grenadiers, led them on to the charge.—He was then struck with a second ball, but still pressed on, when just as the enemy were about to give way, he received a third ball in the breast and groin, and sank.—When they raised him from the ground, he cried with a faint hand to clear the disorder from his eyes. He could not see how the battle went, and was sinking in the earth when the cry, 'They run!' 'They run!' aroused his fleeting spirit. 'Who run?' asked the dying hero. 'The French,' replied his supporters, 'they give way everywhere.' 'What!' said he 'do they run already? now God be praised—I die happy;' and so saying, the youthful victor breathed his last. Such was the death of Wolfe at the early age of thirty-five, when but few men began even to appear on the theatre of great events. He was too precious to be left even on the field of his glory; England jealous of his fame, laid them with his fathers in Greenwich, the town in which he was born. The news of these events reached Britain but forty-eight hours later than the first discouraging despatch, and spread universal joy for the great victory and sorrow for its price. Throughout broad England were illuminations and songs of triumph; one country village was, however, silent and still, there Wolfe's widowed mother mourning the loss of her only son.

Wolfe is described as of a handsome person, with fair complexion and ready hair, possessing a countenance calm, resolute and beaming with intelligence. He must have been starved on his return from Quebec to a most suitable and accomplished lady. Six years after his death she became the wife of the last Duke of Bolton, and died in 1809.

The chivalrous Montcalm also died nobly. When his wounds were pronounced mortal he expressed his thankfulness that he should die before the surrender of Quebec. On being visited by the commander of the Garrison M. de Ramsay and by the commandant De Ramezilles, he entrusted them to endeavour to secure the treaty of the army beyond Cape Rouge. On De Ramsay's growing to receive his commands he refused to interfere, and addressed himself to his religious duties, passed the night with the Bishop and his confessor. Before he died he paid the victorious army this magnanimous compliment. "Since it is my misfortune to be disconcerted and mortally wounded, it is a great satisfaction to me to be vanquished by so brave and generous an enemy." Almost his last act was to write a letter, recommending the French prisoners to the generosity of their victors. His staff-officer M'Cook on the Saturday of the 14th September was buried in an excavation made by the bursting of a shell, whilst Captain Donald McDonald, one of Fraser's Highlanders, who was pretty well acquainted with the French language answered to 'Qui vive?' which is their challenge, 'La France.' When the sentinel replied 'A good Regiment!' the captain replied 'De de Hasse,' which he knew by accident to be one of those commanded by De Bourgainville. The soldier took it for granted that it was an unpaired convoy, and crying 'Pass,' the boats proceeded without further question. One of the sentries soon very thin the rest, running down the water's edge, called out 'Passez vous en tant que nous ne passey pas plus haut?' to which the sentries answered in a soft tone of voice, 'Passez toujours nous connoissons.' This quieted the sentry entirely, and the boats proceeded without further interruption, and landed in the spot now called after Wolfe's Cove.

General Wolfe was one of the first to shore, and on seeing the difficulty of ascending the precipice, observed hastily to Captain McDonald, 'I do not believe I shall see my country at sunrise on the morrow.' THE TIMES

A TWENTY-SEVEN THOUSAND DOLLAR FORGERY.

An extraordinary and unexampled forgery of $27,500 in certificates of deposit of the American Exchange Bank of New York, has just been made public in Pittsburg. The criminals are Stephen D. Dillaye, of the New York Custom House—the enemy who distinguished himself in a newspaper controversy with Secretary Cobb some time since—and one G. G. Langdon of the same city. On the 11th of October, 1858, Dillaye and Langdon presented themselves at the counter of the Citizens' Bank, in Pittsburg, with two certificates of deposit on the American Exchange Bank of New York—one for the sum of $12,000; the other for $15,000; total $27,500. Mr. Langdon represented that Dillaye had come from New York with a draft for that amount drawn by the Cashier of the Monongahela Valley Bank, the funds of which were to be invested in the following manner, viz: $12,000 in Pittsburg, and $15,000 in Allegheny City. The officers of the Citizens' Bank, (Oliver Blackburn, Esq., was absent at the time and E. D. Jones, Esq., the cashier,) examined the face and back of these said by the Americus Exchange Bank, and appeared genuine on their faces. Mr. Langdon was not unknown, having been engaged as the publisher of a directory in Cincinnati at one time, and bearing with him the recommendation of the firm of C. K. Norris & Co., Bankers, of that city. Mr. Jones without hesitation identified the check which Mr. Dillaye took, while Mr. Langdon endorsed the certificates. The junto then left for Makeeport; previously, however, one of them requested Mr. Jones to allow the certificates to remain in the bank a few days, thus making the Citizens' Bank the gainer of one-half per cent—the difference on exchange—by the operation.

About this time it occurred to Mr. Jones to telegraph to the 'American Exchange Bank to inquire if it was all right. An answer was returned immediately that it was not, the certificates were forgeries. Notice was sent by the officers in haste to Mr. McKeesport, but they were not in time enough. They found Dillaye and Langdon subscribing for separate amounts of stock in the Monongahela Valley Bank, and paying down. Langdon's rapid flight down the back stairs; Dillaye 'bristled up,' protested his innocence, and threatened terrible things if anybody should breathe aught against his good name while the Bank Commissioners quietly confiscated the $27,000, and cancelled the Dillaye-Langdon stock.

Nightfall came; taken by being the villians to justice, until about the 13th of August last, when Mr. Jones lodged information with the Mayor of Pittsburgh, who issued his warrant for Langdon and Dillaye, and an officer was dispatched to New York on the 23rd ult., where he arrested Langdon on the 26th. Langdon was then taken to Pittsburgh, where he arrived on the 28th. He throws the responsibility on Dillaye. He says that Dillaye was to furnish $45,000 to take stock in the Monongahela Bank.—When the time came, he failed to furnish a single dollar, and the necessary presented itself with other pressing duties to Gregory of the confidence.

AMERICAN TRIALS AND ENGLISH CRITICS.

A London weekly, (radical famous for its fault-finding and priggishness, as well as for great ability,) reviewing Captain Dr. speeches at the Boston banquet, but the pieces of [illegible] particular or [illegible] character, being occupied, for want of more important subjects, with personalities of the most trifling description. There is some truth in this, though not so much as the Spectatorship Reviewer would make out. It is certainly not for want of important subjects that the American newspapers discuss [illegible]mes. As to the Sickles case, there was about as much reason for the details exhibited in England as here; and the conviction of Mrs. Sickles, which was published by only some of the journals at this side, was, we noticed, copied into nearly all the British newspapers from the Lands End to John O'Groat's. But people have a bad habit of not seeing themselves as others see them, and our contemporaries over the water certainly show a want of common sense and charitableness in drawing their illustrations from such [illegible] as the [illegible] case of this was lately offered by an Edinburgh paper, which, from [illegible] to five several books, chose as specimens [illegible] the Atlantic. It discovered as a 'Scotch Yankee Attorney,' the [illegible] of a story which had appeared in its columns; and at the very time when it showed us in this remarkable manner, to one publishing weekly, without acknowledgment, and as original, of course the latest exciting romance from the New York Ledger.

As regards the [illegible] of details concerning persons of such notoriety as Mr. and Mrs. Sickles, we submit that British, and most of all English, journalists are [illegible] seeing their contemporaries in America, —

American newspapers have never surpassed, nor even equalled, those of England in minute particulars of crime and immorality. No criminal in this country ever was immortalized as Palmer was by the press in England. The office of every well-conducted [illegible] was one of utter horror at the universal pandering to the morbid appetite to harrow criminal. Very similar was the feeling with which we regarded the [illegible] business in this country. If we had discussed the subject, however, we should have spoiled it in a parody of American one. It is here that English writers err. Believing that [illegible] this country [illegible] is [illegible] of the universal clamouring, and so from their lofty stand point the moralists of the English press degenerate about Mississippi characteristics, which—are by no means national in their [illegible] Englishmen of the University stamp is not a very accurate index of manners abroad. As the trait of a dilettante over his stiff-bristle shaker with more affinity for or relation, he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

STARTLING BUT TRUE!

SURVIVOR OF PERISH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or upon derived from the experience of a few doctors, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which had never been collected in Europe of any discovery or invention since it began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

Whenever this disease attacks the liver, it is repelled and exterminated by the searching, painless and irresistible curative.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this antidotean agent, and a rapid return to health and activity will be the unerring result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great concoct of this continent yields quickly to a course of these corrective Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; all matter in what blindness shape this bane of disease exhibits itself, the searching and restoring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

COLDS and CONSUMPTION.

In whatever cause, however severe, and of however long standing, a thorough and fair trial of these Pills and Ointment will be found infallible in all her chronicles.

SCORBUTIC DISEASES

Should lose no time in trying a few doses of these purifying and unerring remedy; when [illegible] its all her chronicles.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known for the following complaints:

Ague, Bowel Complaints, Blotches, Constipation, Colds, Consumption, Debility, Dropsy, Dysentery, Erysipelas, Fevers of all kinds, Female Irregularities, Gout, Headache, Indigestion, Inflammation, Jaundice, Liver Complaints, Lumbago, Piles, Rheumatism, Retention of Urine, Scrofula or King's Evil, Secondary Symptoms, Stone and Gravel, Sore Throats, Tic Doloureux or Face Ache, Tumours, Ulcers, Venereal Affections, Worms of all kinds, Weakness, from whatever cause originating.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment are manufactured only at 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar), London, and are sold by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the civilized world, at the following prices:—1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot.

There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are affixed to each Box or Pot.

Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes, and if the address be not 244, Strand, they may be assured the Medicines are spurious.

Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the civilized world.

BY-LAW No.—

A By-Law to authorize the Mayor of the Town of Peterborough, to raise by way of loan, the sum of four thousand pounds, for the purpose therein mentioned, and to issue Debentures therefor, payable at the expiration thereof.

Passed the [illegible] day of [illegible] A. D. 1859

WHEREAS, the Municipality of the Town of Peterborough, did on the eleventh day of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, pass a By-Law authorizing and providing for issuing of the said Town, by debentures and other than thousand pounds of stock in the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway Company, on behalf of the said Municipality

And Whereas the sum of eight hundred and twenty-five pounds, is still required to pay the balance of the stock so subscribed, and the expenses connected with the issue of Debentures for the repayment of the said stock.

And Wherein the sum of three hundred pounds is required to pay the Government for the balance due on the Land, at the South end of the Town, and the claims of the Squatters thereon.

And Whereas it is desirable and necessary to expend in grading, gravelling, and otherwise improving the streets of the said Town, the sum of eight hundred and seventy-five pounds.

And Whereas, to carry into effect the said recited objects, it will be necessary for the said Municipal Corporation, to raise the sum of two thousand pounds, in the manner hereinafter mentioned.

And whereas, it will require the sum of three hundred and twenty pounds, to be raised annually by special rate, for the payment of the said loan or debt, and interest as also hereinafter mentioned.

And Whereas, the amount of the whole rateable property of the said Municipality, irrespective of any future increase of the same, and irrespective of any income from said stock or shares in the return of tolls, interest, or dividends; and also irrespective of any income to be derived from the temporary investment of the [illegible] specified mentioned or any part thereof, according to the last revised Assessment roll of the said Municipality, being for the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, was seventeen thousand six hundred and eighty-one pounds.

And Whereas, for paying the interest and creating an equal yearly sinking fund, for paying the said sum of two thousand pounds, and interest as hereinafter mentioned, it will require an equal annual special rate of four pence three eighths of a penny in the pound, in addition to all rates to be levied in each year. Be it therefore enacted by the Corporation of the Town of Peterborough.

1st. That it shall be lawful for the Mayor to raise by way of loan from any person or persons, body or bodies corporate, who may be willing to advance the same upon the credit of the Debentures hereinafter mentioned, a sum of money not exceeding in the whole, the sum of two thousand pounds, and to cause the same to be paid into the hands of the Treasurer, for the purposes, and with the objects above recited.

2nd. That it shall be lawful for the said Mayor to cause any number of Debentures to be made for such sums of money as may be required, not less than one hundred pounds each, and in the whole not to exceed the said sum of two thousand pounds, and that the said Debentures shall be sealed with the seal of the said Municipality, be signed by the Mayor, and countersigned by the Clerk.

3rd. That the said Debentures shall be made payable at the office of the Commercial Bank of Canada, in Peterborough, in ten years at furthest from the day hereinafter mentioned, for this By-law to take effect, and shall have attached to them Coupons for the payment of interest.

4th. That the said Debentures shall bear interest at and after the rate of six per cent per annum, from the date thereof, which interest shall be payable half yearly, on the first days of April and October respectively, at the office of the Treasurer aforesaid.

5th. That for the purpose of forming a sinking fund for the payment of the said Debentures, and the interest at the rate aforesaid, to become due thereon, an equal special rate of four pence three eighths of a penny in the pound, shall, in addition to all other rates, be raised levied, and collected, in each year upon all the rateable property, in the said Municipality, during the continuance of the said Debentures or any of them.

6th. That for the purpose of taking the votes of the Municipal Electors on this By-law a poll shall be opened according to law in the North Ward in the shop of Hugh Evans on Monday the nineteenth day of September next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and James Lines is hereby named to act as Returning Officer, to take the votes in the said Ward. In the Centre Ward in the office of Thomas Eastland on Monday the nineteenth day of September next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and Robert Rowan is hereby named to act as Returning Officer in the said Centre Ward. In the South Ward, in the shop of Mathew Lane, on Monday the nineteenth day of September next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon and Ivan O'Beirne is hereby named to act as Returning Officer. And for the East Ward, in the Town Hall, on Monday the nineteenth day of September next, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon, and James Edwards is hereby named to act as Returning Officer in the said East Ward.

7th. That this By-law shall take effect and come into operation upon the first day of October A. D. 1859.

TAKE NOTICE

THAT the above is a true copy of a proposed By-law which will be taken into consideration by the Council of this Municipality after one month from the first publication in the Examiner Newspaper, the date of which first publication was on Thursday the 25th day of August 1859, and that the votes of the electors of the said Municipality will be taken thereon in the North Ward in the shop of Hugh Evans, on Monday, the 19th day of September next, at ten o'clock, a. m. In the Centre Ward in the office of Thomas Eastland on Monday the 19th day of September next at 10 o'clock a. m. TO LET. A [illegible] House, [illegible] TO LET. [illegible]

Original Poetry.

A Templar's Greeting.

Hail Y'all hail! thrice happy band,
A glorious work is thine,
While heart with heart, and hand with hand
So lovingly combine.

Be thine the glory, thine the meed,
The praise to virtue due:
For 'tis a worthy task indeed
The Demon to pursue.

A very demon, fraught with power,
Most potent to ensnare,
Each promise bright of youth's gay hour
And manhood's flowering bloom.

A never-failing source of ill
And human misery;
Of yawning graves, the fiend's doom,
Crushed hopes, the gallow's tree.

The hapless widow's bursting sob
Of deep unfathomed woe;
While strainless children starve for bread,
Which she can ne'er bestow.

For he is gone: the prized the dear;
(Woe love grew weak to save;)
The husband, father sleepeth here—where?
Within a drunkard's grave.

A drunkard's grave? O! end most foul,
O, memory's rankling thorn;
They shrink to name him to the world,
T'would laugh their grief to scorn.

And she must toil—slave, day by day
Heartbroken and alone;
Unchered by Hope's reviving ray
That once so brightly shone.

She still must strive, and even life
So hopeless must be wooed;
Affection claims for helpless babes
Their raiment and their food.

Oh! what a wretched fate is this,
When Nature's gasping moan
Proclaims that hope, light, joy are past,
And each bright vision flown.

With naught to cool her burning brow
Or soothe each aching throe;
Sure death were doubly welcome now,
Sweet solace to her woe.

Was the towering form, the soul so blim
Those god-like features given
For such a base, ignoble aim
By too indulgent Heaven.

To yonder fallen erring one
To abject man and vile;
Who flush'd with wine reels madly home
To chill affection's smile.

Ah, no! ah, no! yet taunt him not,
"Ye know not half the power
With which the fiend's temptation came
In some unguarded hour.

Ye may not know how earnestly
He struggled, or how well,
Until the hour of darkness came,
When sadly thus he fell.

Assail him not with scornful tone,
Nor mock his misery;
"Deal gently with that erring one,
As God hast dealt with thee."

Forgive as thou would be forgiven,
O, blest Fraternity!
Seek to reclaim, with Love's pure leav'n,
"Faith, Hope and Charity."

His truant soul from devious ways
Of sorrow, sin and shame;
And he, even he, shall sing thy praise
And bless thy lasting fame.

Now by you Heaven so blue above us,
Our matrons and our sires;
By those we love and those who love us,
By honour's sacred fires.

The drunkard's bier, the orphan's tear,
The widow's anguish'd moan,
The soul enslav'd, the suicide's grave,
Guilt's penitential groan.

We'll nerve the heart and brace the arm
With energy strong to-day,
And never-ending wage the war,
Exterminating ever and for[illegible]
King Alcohol's grim sway.

Those who take their opinions of women from the report of a rake will be no nearer the truth than those who take their opinions of men from the lips of a prostitute.

Rocks in the journey of life are like hills which alarm travellers upon their road; they both appear great at a distance, but when we approach them, we find that they are the best instrumentable thing we had conceived.

The man of pleasure should more properly be termed the man of pain; like Diogenes, he purchases repentance at the highest price, and sells the richest remorse for the poorest reality.

When invalids rise the commencement is the first step relieve, and when they fall he is the last that gains.

Age and love commonly suit; if they are even allied, the former the friendship the weaker, from the inconsistency; and as one man, like a soldier, can never make love without looking, his own death-watch.—It may not be generally known that the male spider is provided with a little shuttle, concealed within its body, in which he lodges his mistress in order to safeguard and shelter her assiduity.

An observing man can search out, in any woman, in future time, what he pleases, when there are none so fine that they may not at some time be able to suspect an indelicacy. Therefore, most licentious would the male creature prudent seem. For in the imagination of touching the weakest, and not above shifting the former till here evidence of such baseness of forbearance as will secure him the greatest art of all. But, my brethren, one may learn from love to read the secret of God as a divine law.

The Murder at Silver Creek

FULL PARTICULARS.

From the Hamilton Journal.

Late on Thursday evening, we learn that a double murder had been committed at Silver Creek, in the township of Esquesing, coupled with circumstances of unparalleled atrocity. The precise facts of the outrage were but imperfectly ascertained, but the reputed murderer being well-known in town the excitement occasioned by the unexpected announcement was of course intense.—About ten o'clock Donaldson, the individual charged with the crime, arrived in town in charge of Constables Barnes and Galbraith, and was safely lodged in the cells.

Messrs. Biscoby and Co., lime burners, employ a number of men in their business at a place called the "Rock" about three miles west of Georgetown. Monday the 12th inst., being the day appointed on which their men received their wages, Thomas Kelly and Michael McGrath went to Preston's tavern Silver Creek, to buy some whiskey. Kelly got a gallon jug filled and McGrath two quart jugs, and in company with a young man of the name of John Donaldson, in the employ of Nevins Jones, drank till about ten o'clock. The tavern-keeper stated they must have drank five or six times before they started for home. It appears that McGrath paid for the whiskey. Between ten and eleven o'clock the three left the tavern together, Kelly and McGrath being considerably under the influence of liquor. Thomas Preston, brother of the inn-keeper, went along with them to the end of the lane leading to Jones' saw-mill, being a bye-way through the woods. The mill is about three miles west of the gravel road. Preston here bade all of them good night, and told Donaldson who appeared to be sober, to take care of the other two.—He proposed to do so, and took hold of McGrath's arm, as he appeared to be the least affected with liquor. About sixty or eighty rods up the lane from where Preston left them is a log-house, occupied by a William Greggs and his family. Mrs. Greggs who had not retired to rest, heard a noise proceeding from parties on the road, opposite the house. She looked through the window and saw the figure of three men going in the direction of Jones' mill. This was the last time the two unfortunate men were seen alive by any person other than Donaldson. What occurred after that is only known to the accused, and whose statement before the magistrates will be found below. He states that after going past Greggs' house, they went into a buck-wheat field and sat down when a stranger came towards them from the direction of the 6th Line, in whose company he left them.

Kelly not returning home, his wife became uneasy at his continued absence, having an unaccountable presentiment, that something fatal had happened to him. Early on Tuesday morning she went out in search of him, but in reply to her anxious enquirers she received no tidings of her husband.—Alas! the treacherous assassin had buried him into the presence of his Creator, and his mangled corpse, the blood not yet cold, lay in a crevice of the rocks like a stone thrown from the highway. Tuesday closed over the bodies of the murdered men, and the perfidious outrage yet lay wrapped in mystery. On Wednesday morning Mrs. Kelly renewed the search, but without success.—Learning that Donaldson had left his employment without known any cause she lodged information with Jas. Young, Esq., Georgetown, who had him arrested. Mr. Biscoby, in whose employment the two missing men had been, ordered his men sixteen in number—to turn out about noon to search the woods. For some time they saw nothing to lead to the discovery of the object of their search, but at last they saw marks of blood on some stones. Following the traces of blood, they discovered the bodies of Kelly and McGrath in the crevice of a rock entirely covered over with wood, brush and rubbish with the exception of one boot belonging to Kelly, which served as the means of their discovery. Fire had been applied to the heap and one of Kelly's whiskers was consumed and his face a little scorched, but beyond the no injury was done as the fire had gone out without accomplishing the diabolical end the villan had in view. On finding the bodies Mr. Biscoby and Mr. Smallbones, the overseer, applied to Robert McCullough, Esq., M. D., Coroner Georgetown, who was promptly on the spot and had the bodies conveyed to Preston's tavern, where a jury was impannelled and some progress made in the investigation, but owing to the advanced hour further enquiry was postponed till next day. On Thursday morning the inquest was resumed in the Town Hall, Georgetown, James Barber, Esq., acting as associate Coroner. The mass of evidence which was heard is too lengthy to appear in our columns. The Coroner summed up the evidence and charged the Jury at some length, when the following verdict was returned:

VERDICT.

"We, the undersigned jury, being duly sworn on the inquest held on the bodies of Thomas Kelly and Michael Mcgrath, both of the Township of Esquesing, the 14th and 15th days of September instant, at Georgetown in the County of Halton, after maturely hearing and examining the evidence adduced, do make the following verdict, viz.—That the said Thomas Kelly and Michael McGrath above named came to their death by the hands of John Donaldson, by inflicting several heavy blows on each of the said parties heads above named, with stones or some other deadly weapon.

THE CRISIS.

THE MARKET

During the last year there were 1859, steps proper were published and given [illegible] of the railroads of the United Kingdom open for traffic, by accidents, the causes of which were beyond their own control; within 50 were killed and 22 injured from want of caution, or misconduct.

Mr. James Smith, of Rugeley, was shot in the thigh and killed, by his servant girl whom he had stationed in his garden armed with a gun, with orders to shoot at any one she saw meddling with the grapes. Mr. Smith himself was the first person who approached; but being partially concealed by the vine he was not recognized; and the girl, getting somewhat too faithfully according to orders, poured the full charge into her master, with fatal precision.—Moral. Don't think of shooting men for the sake of a little fruit.

Among the singular discoveries in the bath way is one in Germany, which is said to [illegible] by chemistry. The [illegible] have taken the old elephant. What the result would be upon any thin gentleman or lady who should make the mistake to go to this bath is curious to speculate upon; nothing less than a walking skeleton or moving shadows could ensue.

The Overland Route from England to British India.—By the London papers we learn that a railroad for conveying vessels across the Isthmus of Suez is in course of preparation. The promoters of the undertaking appear to consider they have propounded a novel idea, but such is not the fact. A century has elapsed since Fielding, in the farce of the Coffee House Politician, makes one of his principal characters, say:—"I have contrived a method to pay off the debt of the nation without a penny of money;" and to her inquiry into his scheme he explains:—"By procuring a machine to carry ships by land about one hundred miles, and so prosecute the East-India trade through the Mediterranean." Whether the success of the project will secure so desirable a consummation, is a question of greater interest to our English friends than ourselves, and we do not regard it as within our province to [illegible] here, but the quotation of the above sentence proves that the idea is not original and forcibly illustrates the saying of the wise man, that "there is nothing new under the sun."

Direct Trade from Lake Ontario to Liverpool.

Yesterday afternoon the Union, a smart clipper schooner, one of the centre-board build, entered the Murney, from Hamilton, in the "far west," loaded with staves. The Union was built a few years ago for the lake trade, and was destined to show her heels to any crack Yankee schooner afloat. The Great Western Railway of Canada having brought out staves for such vessels, Messrs. Lang & Delane, of Hamilton, chartered the Union, and loaded her for Liverpool. The Union made a good run down the lakes to Quebec, and from thence she came to Liverpool under the specified time—18 days.—Liverpool Times, August 31.

Visit of the Prince of Wales.

Writing on this subject, the Liverpool Times of Sept. 3rd, received by the Persia says:—

"If the Canadians cannot secure the presence of the Queen at the opening of the Great Victoria Bridge, they are likely, it might be believed from the Prince of Wales, accompanied in all likelihood, by the Colonial Secretary in the course of the coming year. This will be something, and the young Prince and the Minister may rely upon a warm and generous reception. We wish for the sake of the Canadians that her Majesty would undertake the journey. She seems to be a good sailor, from the frequency of her journeys in the royal yacht, and a voyage across the Atlantic would be nothing to one accustomed to the cross-currents of the channel. Being on the American Continent, she could hardly escape a visit to New York,—perhaps to Washington,—and the result would be indeed gratifying to all concerned."

COMMUNICATION.

To the Editor of the Examiner:

Dear Sir,—The Council met to-day to re-consider the By-law passed on the 18th, for the purpose of putting the Township into Wards. After silencing Mr. Self for a few minutes, they came to the general conclusion of dividing the Town Hall to the Norwood Ward.

Yours, &c.,
A-Rtespatra.

BY-LAW No.—

A By-law to authorize the Mayor to [illegible] of Peterborough, to raise by way of loan, the sum of [illegible] pounds, by the issuing thereof [illegible] and to [illegible] Debentures therefor, and [illegible] for the payment thereof.

Passed the [illegible] day of [illegible] A. D. 1859

WHEREAS, the Municipality of the Town of Peterborough, did on the fifteenth day of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, pass a By-Law authorizing and requiring the Mayor of the said Town, to subscribe and take three thousand pounds of stock in the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway Company, on behalf of the said Municipality.

And Whereas the sum of eight hundred and seventy-five pounds, is still required to pay the balance of the stock so subscribed, and the expenses connected with the issue of Debentures for the payment of the said stock.

And Whereas the sum of three hundred pounds is required to pay the Government for the balance due on the Land, at the South end of the Town, and the claims of the Squatters thereon.

And Whereas it is desirable and necessary to expend in grading, gravelling, and otherwise improving the streets of the said Town, the sum of eight hundred and seventy-five pounds.

And Whereas, to carry into effect the said recited objects, it will be necessary for the said Municipal Corporation, to raise the sum of two thousand pounds, in the manner hereinafter mentioned.

And whereas, it will require the rate of three hundred and seventy pounds, to be raised annually by special rate, for the payment of the said loan or debt, and interest as also hereinafter mentioned.

And Whereas, the amount of the whole rateable property of the said Municipality, representative of any future increase of the same, and irrespective of any income from said stock or shares in the return of tolls, interest, or dividends; and also irrespective of any income to be [illegible] of the stocking fund hereinafter mentioned or any part thereof, according to the last revised Assessment roll of the said Municipality, being for the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight [illegible] seven hundred and eighty-one pounds.

And Whereas, for paying the interest and creating an equal yearly sinking fund, and paying the said sum of two thousand pounds, and interest as hereinafter mentioned, it will require an equal annual special rate of four pence three eighths of a penny in the pound, in addition to all rates to be levied in each year. Be it therefore enacted by the Corporation of the Town of Peterborough.

1st. That it shall be lawful for the Mayor to raise by way of loan from any person or persons, body or bodies corporate, who may be willing to advance the same upon the credit of the Debentures hereinafter mentioned, a sum of money not exceeding in the whole, the sum of two thousand pounds, and to cause the same to be paid into the hands of the Treasurer, for the purposes, and with the objects above recited.

2nd. That it shall be lawful for the said Mayor to cause any number of Debentures to be made for such sums of money as may be required, not less than one hund ed pounds each, and in the whole not to exceed the said sum of two thousand pounds, and that the said Debentures shall be sealed with the seal of the said Municipality, be signed by the Mayor, and countersigned by the Clerk.

3rd. That the said Debentures shall be made payable at the office of the Commercial Bank of Canada, in Peterborough, in ten years at furthest from the day hereinafter mentioned, for this By-law to take effect, and shall have attached to them Coupons for the payment of interest.

4th. That the said Debentures shall bear interest at and after the rate of six per cent per annum, from the date thereof, which interest shall be payable half yearly, on the first days of April and October respectively, at the office of the Treasurer aforesaid.

5th. That for the purpose of forming a sinking fund for the payment of the said Debentures, and the interest at the rate aforesaid, to become due thereon, an equal special rate of four pence three eighths of a penny in the pound, shall, in addition to all other rates, be raised levied, and collected, in each year upon all the rateable property, in the said Municipality, during the continuance of the said Debentures or any of them.

6th. That for the purposes of taking the votes of the Municipal Electors on this By-law a poll shall be opened according to law in the North Ward in the shop of Hugh Evans on Monday the nineteenth day of September next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and Robert Howe is hereby appointed to act as Returning Officer in the said Centre Ward. In the South Ward, in the shop of Mathew Lane, on Monday the nineteenth day of September next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon and Ivan O'Beirne is hereby named to act as Returning Officer. And for the East Ward, in the Town Hall, on Monday the nineteenth day of September next, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon, and James Edwards is hereby named to act as Returning Officer in the said East Ward.

7th. That this By-law shall take effect and come into operation upon the first day of October A. D. 1859.

TAKE NOTICE

THAT the above is a true copy of a proposed By-law which will be taken into consideration by the Council of this Municipality after one month from the first publication in the Examiner Newspaper, the date of which first publication was on Thursday the 25th day of August 1859; and that the votes of the electors of the said Municipality will be taken thereon in the North Ward in the shop of Hugh Evans, on Monday, the 19th day of September next, at ten o'clock, a. m. In the Centre Ward in the office of Thomas Eastland on Monday the 19th day of September next at 10 o'clock a. m. In the South Ward in the shop of Mother Lane on Monday the 19th day of September next at 10 o'clock a. m. Valuable Property FOR SALE,

On Liberal Terms of Credit.

BY

PUBLIC AUCTION.

WILL be sold on the premises, in the Town of Peterborough, on Wednesday, 2nd Nov., 1859.

at the hour of Two o'clock in the afternoon.—By virtue of a Power of Sale in that behalf, contained in a certain Indenture of Mortgage, dated the Fourth day of November, A. D., 1857, and made by John Glen of the Town of Peterborough in the County of Peterborough, Merchant, of the first part, and Harriet Glen, his wife, of the second part, and George Coupar and William Ogilvy of the said Town of Peterborough, Merchants, of the third part; All and singular those certain parcels or tracts of land and premises, being Town Lots, Numbers Three and Four south of Sherbrooke Street and West of George street, in the Town of Peterborough; together with all the houses, buildings and erections thereon, and all appurtenances thereunto belonging.

The above property is situated in the flourishing town of Peterborough, and is within two hundred yards of the Port Hope and Peterboro' Railway Depot, with which a connection could be made at a trifling cost. There is a large and substantial building on the property, which was built and fitted up for distilling purposes, but never having been used, could be turned into Flour Mills or any kind of Manufactory at a comparatively trifling expense. It is particularly adapted to either Distilling or Brewing purposes on a large scale, as it contains all the Tubs, Shafting, Copperworks and Machinery necessary for the first business, constructed on the most approved principles. A considerable stream running through the premises furnishes a never failing supply of water, and might readily be used in conjunction with steam as a motive power.—There is a new Engine and Boiler in the building which cost $3600. These are of the most approved make, are very powerful, and have never been used. The Out-houses are well built, and are capable of Stabling two Hundred head of Cattle. Altogether the property will be found one of the most desirable investments for Capitalists, Manufacturers or others to be met with.

TERMS OF SALE,

One fourth down, and the remainder in equal payments, at ONE, TWO AND THREE years. For further particulars apply to

Selected Poetry.

The Little Grave.

"It is only a little grave," they said,
"Only just a child that's dead;"
And so they carelessly turned away
From the mound he made that day
Ah, they did not know how deep a shade
That little grave in our home had made.

I know the coffin was narrow and small,
One yard would have served for an ample pall;
And one man in his arms could have borne away
The pine bed and its freight of clay.
But I know what darling hopes were hid
Beneath that tiny coffin lid.

I knew that a mother had stood that day
With folded hands by that form of clay;
I knew that burning tears were hid,
"Neath the drooping lash and aching lid;"
And I knew her lip, and cheek, and brow
Were almost as white as her baby's now.

I knew that some things were hid away,
The crimson flush and wavy rings gay;
The little frock and the half-worn shoe,
The cap with its ribbon and tassels blue;
And an empty crib with its covers spread
As white as the face of the sinless dead.

'Tis a little grave, but oh! beware!
For world-wide hopes are buried there,
And yet, perhaps, in coming years,
May see, I ween, through aching tears,
How much of light, how much of joy,
Is buried up with an only boy!

A Touching Episode of the Franklin Expedition.

The important news brought by the last English steamer, in relation to the fate of Sir John Franklin and his brave companions, recalls an interesting incident connected with that memorable expedition, and which he will narrate.

In the West of England are two towns whose corporate limits are less than a mile apart, and which have been for many years united into Parliamentary borough. One of them, Penryn, has an existence of many centuries, being recorded as a thriving market town A. D., 1258. The other, Falmouth, had no existence previous to the seventeenth century, although now an important seaport, and exceeding its older neighbor in population and business. Both towns are situated in the same inlet or arm of the sea, Penryn being at its extreme head. As might be expected there has existed a strong jealousy between the towns, which was not decreased by their ill-assorted union into one Parliamentary borough whilst still retaining their separate corporate existence. Penryn considers its neighbor as an upstart, whilst Falmouth retorts by sneering at the older borough as old-fashioned and fossilized. Desperate fight and bitter personal quarrels have been thus occasioned, being even in a worse state of things than that formerly existed between Cleveland and Ohio city, whose position was somewhat similar to that of the towns in question.

About fifteen years ago a young sailor, named Johns, a native of Penryn, belonging to a coasting vessel sailing between that port and London. He was the accepted suitor of Miss Cook, a young girl in about his own circumstances, but whose personal attractions gained the attention of more than one young man of better station. As it is not to be wondered at, the young woman was a bit of coquette, and flirted, in the absence of her accepted lover, with some of her other admirers. Among these was a dashing young fellow, a professed "lady-killer," from Falmouth, who had once had a quarrel with young Johns on account of local prejudices, and whose attentions to Miss Cook were at first prompted by a spirit of malice to his adversary. He took her to places of amusement, rode or walked with her on Sundays, and endeavoured to make his attention to her as public as he possibly could.

Rumors of this had reached Johns on some of his trips home, but as he never saw them together he always passed the tales by with as little attention as possible. Once, however, his vessel arrived in port on a Sunday evening, and the lover hastily donned his best suit and rushed off to see his lady-love. She was not at home, having gone to church. Impatiently he hurried off to the church, and near its gate met his apparently faithless sweetheart walking arm-in-arm with his detested Falmouth adversary. Without waiting to meet them, he turned and went on board his ship.

It was the time when the brave Frank in was forming his expedition for the exploration of the North-west passage, and great inducements in the way of bounty money and comparatively large pay were held out to the hardy and adventurous mariners — The two towns furnished several volunteers Penryn sent out four hardy fellows. One of these was young Johns. Stung by the seeing faithlessness of his beloved, he had joined the daring party and were to seek fame, and perhaps death amid the unknown terrors of the North Pole.

Soon after this rash step had been taken, Johns learned that Miss Cook was still faithful to him alone. The meeting between them must have been both sweet and bitter —sweet in the knowledge of each other's constancy—bitter in the certainty that they must part, for it was now too late to retreat Even if it were possible to withdraw from this service under government, manly honour forbade a cowardly desertion of the townsmen who had volunteered with him: nor could he care to face the jeers of the rival town. Besides there was a strong hope of a speedy return, and the girl was somewhat proud after all, of his bravery and the honor which the daring step would attach to his name.

On a bright May morning they were married in the old Church of St. Gluvias, and a merry peal rang from the square grey tower in honor of the nuptials, for Johns was a favorite with very many of the townspeople, and the bride was, as we have said, somewhat of the belle of that place. The honeymoon was of but a few days duration, for the volunteers were soon ordered to join their ships.

On the 23d of May, 1845, the Erebus and Terror sailed from the river Thames, with 136 souls on board. On the 26th of July in that year the whaling ship Prince of Wales spoke them at the entrance of Lancaster Sound. That was the last time the members of the expedition were ever seen by civilized men.

The wires of the explorers monthly drew half the pay of their husbands. The other half accumulated in the hands of the government until the return of the husband, or the official notification of their deaths.—Mrs. Johns drew her pay and lived at home with her parents, eagerly looking for accounts of the expedition. In time she became the mother of a boy, and in her new duties she passed the time less heavily.

Months rolled on to years, but still no tidings came of the fated vessels. Expedition after expedition went in search of the missing men, but always returned with the same story of privation, danger and want of success. With painful eagerness the anxious watcher now grasped the weekly London newspaper in search of news of the lost ones, and eagerly brought the opinions of skilled navigators as to the chances of their safety. Hope at last seemingly died out in it hearts but hers. She clung to the last straw.

Those who climbed the steep of Pendennis Castle eight or nine years since, may have seen on Sunday afternoon a comly woman, clad in plain but neat dress, seated on an embrasure of a battery, gazing out on the waters of the English Channel, waiting and watching for the vessels that never came. Her little boy skipped about, picking the daisies and butter cups that spangled the grassy slopes.

At length hope died out of all hearts, even hers. But still she lived on her quiet life. The visits to the heights were no longer made, but friends saw that the absent one was in her thoughts. Then came the tidings brought by Dr. Rae, convincing every one that the sad drama of life had actually been played out on those everlasting ice-fields. Government, when had continued the pay to the bereaved wives, was now compelled to officially announce the unfortunate explorers as dead. The half-pay which had accumulated in its coffers, was now paid over to the representatives of the deceased, and future pay was stopped. To Mrs. John's the sum paid over amounted to about a hundred pounds sterling.

Now at last the widow's weeds were put on, and the fatherless lad was dressed in mourning. When we last heard of them—about a year since—they were still living in their native town, pursuing the old course of life. The widow eked out her little fund by sewing.

Whether the husband, who had seen but a few day of wedded life, and who had never seen or heard of his son, was one of the twenty-four who had died previous to April 25th, 1848, or had participated in that terrible march to death in search of the Great Fish River we cannot say. The reception of the full details of the news brought by the Fox may throw some light on that matter. Of this much we are confident that Johns did his duty to the last and died as a brave man should die. There are those here who knew him well, and pay this last tribute to the memory of a old friend.

A Queer Experiment.

SIXTY AND SIXTEEN.

About a week since a fair young girl arrived at this city, from London, Canada West. She came on the Port Burwell Packet, and took rooms at a modest but comfortable hotel. Her wardrope was rather scanty, but she had plenty of money, and calling to her aid several milliners and dressmakers, she soon dashed out in gay and attractive style. She registered her name as Sarah May, London, C. W., destination West. She told the landlord she expected her uncle at the end of the week, and on Saturday morning he arrived. He was an active and affable gentleman, well dressed and airy but gray as a rat, and evidently sixty years old at least. He paid his nieces bill, and the pair purposed leaving on the 5.50 Columbia train.

But early in the afternoon there arrived at the hotel, an uncouth old baggy trowsers, a bed-blanket coat, a hat belonging to previous generation, and with a slight Yorkshire accent. This old man angrily confronted the other old man, and charged with running away with his daughter, who was not and never had been his (the old man's) niece. The other old man, the new comer said he had a wife and eight children at home, four of whom were grown up. It also appeared from the injured father's story that the ancient gay deceiver's name was M'Maken; that he had been a magistrate; that he had been a man of wealth, and had borne a spotless character, up to the time he had induced the girl to run away with him. The retired magistrate had a private interview with the girl's father—we do not know what was said, or what influence was brought to bear upon the injured father—but he returned to London, and the retired magistrate and the young girl left on the 5.50 Columbia train. We get these facts from the landlord in whose hotel the eccentric drama was played. We have no further particulars, but they apparently have a queer way of doing things over in Mrs. Albert's country.—Cleveland (O.) Herald.

NEVER YIELD TO RIDICULE.

Never let your honest convictions be laughed down. You can no more exercise your reason if you live in the constant dread of ridicule, than you can enjoy your life if you are in constant fear of death. If you think it right to defer from the times, and to make a point of morals, do it, however pedantic it may appear, do it—not for insolence, but seriously and gradually, as if a man wore a big soul of his own in his bosom and did not wait till it was breathed into him by the breath of fashion. Be true to your manhood's conviction, and in the end you will not only be respected by the world, but have the approval of your own conscience.

The best adhesive label you can put on your baggage is to stick to it yourself.

A CASE OF SOMNAMBULISM.

A THRILLING INCIDENT.

From the Detroit Free Press.

An incident of thrilling and almost terrible interest combining in itself all the palpitating chances of breathbreath escapes, and the strange romantic ventures of that wierd semblance of life, somnambulism, occurred on the night before last. The scene of this unusual episode was on Catherine street, at the residence of Mr. Israel Moreton, a gentleman in whose veracity we have entire confidence, and from whose lips we received the statement of the particulars.

At about 2½ in the morning, he was awakened by a knocking at the front of his residence, and, upon answering the call found a man on the steps, who in a very incoherent and excited manner, requested him to walk across the street and look at the top of his house. The proposition was so strange that he declined, and stood irresolute for a few moments and was about retiring again, suspicious of foul play, when his eye caught a moving shadow on the front of the opposite house, cast by the moon, which was shining dimly through the fleecy clouds of a gathering equinoctial storm. It indicated that some moving being was walking noiselessly along the narrow ridge of his roof, and as he looked at its slow creeping motion, an indefinable chill crept over him. The shadow strode across the front of the opposite building, and was lost for a moment in the darkness, and then crept into view again, returning in an opposite direction, with the same slow gliding motion. His consternation may be imagined when his gaze fell upon the form of a human being shrouded from head to foot in a long white dress, about which a mass of long hair, much gleamed darkly in the moonbeams, fell in wild confusion. This spectral form paced slowly too and fro on the narrow ridgeboard which covered the apex of the roof, approaching in frightful proximity of the abrupt termination at the ends, and calmly turning about to retrace the distance, always with the same unfaltering step and easy gliding motion. The house was a high one, and a misstep or a step too far, would have plunged the night-walker down to certain destruction—as also would a casual sound, the shout of a midnight reveller, or the crow of a morning cock.

The walker was a woman, and, as she moved back and fourth, she occasionally raised her hand to her head, as though engaged in thought or troubled with pain.—The head never moved to the right or left, up or down, but always maintained the same position, erect and straight as a statute. A chimney stood directly in the middle of the roof, around which she passed with ease, placing one hand upon its top and walking down the sloping roof to get around. Once in this spectral walk she paused at the edge of the roof, and, before turning, looked straight out ahead into the black night, as if peering beyond mortal vision, into some mysterious realm.

A waving movement of the right hand accompanied this act, which lasted but a moment, when the walk was again renewed and the light shadow passed across the faces of the spell-bound gazers as she hid the moon for an instant from their sight. The same spot was reached again a few moments after when the figure again paused, and again gazed out into the darkness, and then, with a slow motion stretched out a hand, and with outstretched fingers clutched at something which had no existence except in the fevered mind of the sleeper. The other hand was then extended in like manner, and the body went forward in such a way that the upper portion hung over the abyss, while the fingers reached out until there was no further reaching, and then clutched again with a quick, convulsive snatch, and were withdrawn. The form was motionless a moment; and then commenced its walk again, continuing as far as the middle of the roof, when it turned towards the rear of the house, and moving down the slope of the roof was lost to sight.

Mr. Moreton, while witnessing this scene had recognized the features and form of his servant girl, a young female of about 18, named Jane Mooney. With a feeling of indescribable relief he saw her disappear, and knew that she had descended through a skylight to the garret and to her room.—Hastening in, he aroused his wife, and went with her to the girl's room and found her sitting on the side of the bed, wide awake, and in a state of mind bordering on distraction. She had no knowledge of the occurrence, but had been awakened by the noise of her employer entering the house, and found herself standing in the middle of her room in the condition described. That the result were no worse was a matter of most devout thankfulness to all within that house.

The girl had been suffering from a brain fever, from which she was gradually recovering, which undoubtedly caused this dangerous freak. She has no knowledge of anything of the kind having occurred previously and will be well watched in future as she is highly esteemed. It was a thrilling adventure with a happy result.

A CLEAR CONSCIENCE.

How bravely a man can walk the earth, bear the heaviest burdens, perform the severest duties, and look all men square in the face, if he bears in his breast a clear conscience! There is no spring so spur, no inspiration like this. To feel that we have omitted no bright task, and left no obligation unfulfilled, thus fills the heart with satisfaction, and the soul with strength.—Conscience, it is said, makes cowards of us all—but only cowards when it reproaches us with some omissions—some shrinking from truth and right and the commission of some wrong.

It is asserted that the nerve of the young ladies of a noble English family, who rendered her account annually for little nursery sticcatoes, among other things put down the modest sum of $350 for brandy to splurge the children with.

THE SQUIRE'S DEATH.

It was the first Sunday in the month, and there was full service. Hiltonbury Church had one of those old-fashioned Altar-rails which form three sides of a square, and where it was the custom that at the words 'Draw near with faith,' the earliest communicants should advance to the rail and remain till their place was wanted by others and that the last should not return to their seats till service was concluded. Mr. Charlecote had for many years been always the first parishioner to walk slowly up the matted aisle, and kneel beside the wall, under the cumbrous old tables of Commandments. There, on this day, he knelt as usual and harvest labours tending to thin the number of communicants, the same who came up first remained to the end, joined their voices in the Eucharistic Lord's Prayer and Angelic Hymn, and bowed their heads at the blessing of the peace that passeth all understanding. It was not till the rest had risen and moving away, that the vicar and the clerk remarked that squire had not risen. Another look and it was plain that he had sunk somewhat forward on his folded arms, and was only supported by the rail and the wall. The vicar hastily summoned the village doctor, who had not yet left the church. They lifted him, and laid him along on the cushioned step where he had been kneeling, but motion and breath were gone, the strong arms were helpless, and the colour had left the open face. Taken at once from the Feast on earth to the glory above could this be called sudden death? There he lay on the Altar step, with hands crossed on his breast, and perfectly blessed repose of his manly countenance, sweetened and ennobled in its stillness, and in every lineament wearing the impress of that Holy Spirit of love who had made it a meet temple. What an unpremeditated lying in the state was that! as by ones and twos, beneath the clergy's eye, the villagers stole in with slowly, beevily feeling tread to gaze in silent awe on their best friend, some sobbing and weeping beyond control, others with grave, almost stolid tranquility or they murmured 'He was a gentleman," which in a poor man's mouth means "he was a just man and patient, the friend of the weak and poor." His farmers and his own labourers put their shoulders to bear him once more to his own house through his half-gathered crops.

"The hand of the reaper
Takes the ears that are hoary,
But the voice of the weeper
Wails manhood in glory."

No, bewail him not. It was glory indeed, but the glory of early autumn, the garnering of the stock of corn in full season. It was well done of the vicar that a few long, full-grained ears of wheat were all that was laid upon his breast in the coffin.—"Hopes and Fears," in the Constitutional Press. Duelling.

It is currently reported through the city that a duel took place on Monday morning between Mr. E. Sherwood the County Engnier, and Mr. Wm. N. Read—or Read, or some such name—the place assigned by rumour as the scene of conflict, being in the adjoining Township of Hull, the weapons said to have been used being pistols. Happily none of the combats were injured. The same authority—Dame Rumour—hath it that the quarrel originated in a Billiard Room in Central Ottawa.

We hope for the credit of the city, as one of the parties holds a respectable station therein, as well as for the credit of the parties themselves, that the story may prove not altogether correct, but we are afraid that such a hope is too improbable to be indulged in.

Where the parties engaged in the disgraceful transaction of no accounts in the community, the whole affair would be deserving of nothing but ridicule. But as it is, the circumstance suggests the inquiry.—Are we relapsing into incipient barbarism that one holding high official station can dare so to outrage law and reason as to perform the function of duelist, in broad daylight on British soil?

But what else could have been expected from Licensing a Gambling Saloon in our midst?

An eminent German in speaking of the action taken by the National Assembly of his native country, in 1849, in suppressing gambling, said that almost all the members of the Assembly expressed an opinion that "these gambling hells were an infamy and a disgrace to Germany, a fountain of moral and economical destruction, a poisonous subliminate of sensuality, a birth place of suicide, and a spring of nameless misfortunes."

Such is the character that German legislators give of the gambling-house! And are not these its characteristic wherever it is established? If so, is it not an infamous stain upon the civilization of our land to license such dens of darkness.—Ottawa Banner.

SAMSON AND WALLACE.

A missionary once visiting an isolated mining district in Scotland, was so astonished at the ignorance of the inhabitants in regard to spiritual knowledge that he suggested that they should meet at some convenient place every Sabbath, and that one of their number should endeavour to edify the rest by reading chapters from the Scriptures On the following Sabbath the missionary's suggestion was realised; and an old man, named John Anderson, rather better informed than his neighbours, was for this purpose elevated on a slight eminence at the gable of a miner's house. Nearly the whole of the males were present and John conducted the opening services by reading that portion of Scripture which speaks of the wonderful exploits of Samson. The attention of his rustic audience seemed much excited during the time he was reading, and just as John had finished his narrative, one of his hearers, a ponderous lump of unsophisticated mortality, bawls out—"Lord man, Jock, he's been a deevil o' a strong fellow that; is there anything about the Wallace Wallie there?"

A Ghost Story.

(From the Boston Traveller, October 10.)

Mr. Hector McDonald, of Canada, was recently on a visit to Boston. When he left home his family were enjoying good health, and he anticipated a pleasant journey. The second morning after his arrival in Boston, when leaving his bed to dress for breakfast, he saw reflected in a mirror the corpse of a woman lying in the bed from which he had just risen. Spell-bound, he gazed with intense feeling, and tried to recognize the features of the corpse, but in vain; he could not even move his eyelids; he felt deprived of action, for how long he knew not. He was at last startled by the ringing of the bell for breakfast, and sprang to the bed to satisfy himself if what he had seen reflected in the mirror was real or an illusion. He found the bed as he had left it, he looked again into the mirror, but only saw the bed truly reflected. During the day he thought much upon the illusion, and determined next morning to rub his eyes and feel perfectly sure that he was wide awake before he left bed. But notwithstanding these precautions, the vision was repeated with this addition, that he thought he recognized in the corpse some resemblance to the features of his wife.

In the course of the second day he received a letter from his wife, in which she stated that she was quite well, and hoped he was enjoying himself among his friends. As he was devotedly attached to her, and always anxious for her safety, he supposed that his morbid fears had conjured up the vision he had seen reflected in the glass; and went about his business as cheerfully as usual. On the morning of the third day, after he had dressed, he found himself in his own house, leaning over the coffin of his wife. His friends were assembled, the minister was performing the funeral services, his children wept—he was in the house of death. He followed the corpse to the grave; he heard the earth rumble upon the coffin, he saw the grave filled, and the green sods covered over it; yet by some strange power, he could see through the ground the entire form of his wife as she lay in her coffin

He looked in the faces of those around him, but no one seemed to notice him; he tried to weep, but the tears refused to flow; his very heart felt as hard as a rock. Enraged at his own want of feeling, he determined to throw himself upon the grave and lie there till his heart should break, when he was recalled to consciousness by a friend, who entered the room to inform him that breakfast was ready. He started as if awoke from a profound sleep, though he was standing before the mirror with a hair-brush in his hand.

After composing himself he related to his friend what he had seen, and both concluded that a good breakfast only was wanting to dissipate his unpleasant impressions. A few days afterwards, however, he received the melancholy intelligence that his wife had died suddenly, and the time corresponded with the day he had been startled by the first vision in the mirror. When he returned home he described minutely all the details of the funeral he had seen in his vision, and they corresponded with the facts. This is probably one of the most vivid instances of clairvoyance on record. Mr. M'Donald knows nothing of modern spiritualism or clairvoyance, as most of his life has been passed upon a farm and among forests. It may not be amiss to state that his father, who was a Scotch Highlander, had the gift "second sight."

Garibaldi's Wife.

I one day cast a casual glance at a house in the Barra of the eastern part of the entrance of the Jayuna, South America, and there observed a young female whose appearance struck me as having something very extraordinary. So powerful was the impression made upon me at the moment, though from some cause which I was not able fully to ascertain, that I gave orders and was transported towards the house. But I knew of no one to whom I could apply for an introduction. I soon, however, met with a person, an inhabitant of the town, who had been acquainted with me from the day of arrival. I soon received an invitation to take coffee with his family, and the first person who entered was the lady whose appearance had so mysteriously but irresistibly drawn me to the place. I saluted her; we were soon acquainted, and I found that the hidden treasure which I had discovered was of rare and inestimable worth. But I have since reproached myself for removing her from her peaceful native retirement to scenes of danger, toil, and suffering. I most deeply felt self-reproach on that day when, at the mouth of the Po, having landed, in our retreat from an Austrian squadron, while still hoping to restore her to life, on taking her pulse I found her a corpse, and sang the hymn of despair. I prayed for forgiveness, for I thought of the sin of taking her from her home." The rest of the lady's story is soon told. She accompanied her husband in his dangerous adventures, fought by his side on sea and land, received a ball through her hat, which cut off a tress of her hair, and travelled from Caribaldi to Legan, 60 mild miles. "Anna passed that dangerous way by night; and such was her boldness that the assassins fled at the sight of her; for the courageous woman, mounted on a fiery horse which she had asked for and obtained at a house on her way, where it would have been difficult for a traveller to hire one, she galloped, in a tempestuous night, among broken, rocky ground, by the flashes of lightning. Four of the enemy's cavalry, who were posted on guard at river Canves, when they saw her approaching, were overwhelmed with fear, supposing it to be a vision, and fled. When she reached the bank of that stream, which was swollen by the rains to a dangerous mountain torrent, she did not stop or attempt to cross it in a canoe, as she had done when passing it a few days before in my company; but, dismounting, she coaxed that bold colt the foal of her horse, and, encouraging him with her voice, he d and swam, struggling through the foam dragging her with him. The distance which she had thus to pass was not less than 500 paces, but they reached the opposite shore in safety." Four days' hard riding, and only a cup of coffee! Flying with her husband from the Austrian army, after the great French treason of 1849, she landed with him at Mesola, and died shortly afterwards on the beach.—Life of General Garibaldi.

OUR TWO RECENT DISASTERS.

GOOD COMES OUT OF EVIL.

From the London Times.

The most conspicuous troubles of life are not utter failures, but such accidents as babies call 'provoking,' because just enough to disappoint a too sanguine expectation.—We have no desire to deprecate what we deeply lament, but just of this sort are the two disasters that gave so sad a shade to our yesterday's columns. Was it in reason that by throwing a few rockets into a provincial city, and extorting a bit of paper from a barbarian, we should be able to walk all over China? Was it in reason that the grandest achievement of human enterprise should start on its first voyage without a mishap? No one can doubt that we shall soon be as much at home and as safe at Pekin as at Paris; as little can it be doubted that the 'Great Eastern' will soon be plying across the ocean as regularly as the packets between Folkestone and Boulogne. That an unexpected resistance has driven back an escort, or that a people whose only skill is treachery should have succeeded in an ambuscade, only recalls a thousand similar incidents that had no effect whatever on the result. It is like the traveller's mishap which loses him a train, frets him for a day is forgotten in a week, and does not retard by one minute the termination of his journey. If we look to the end, what has happened the 'Great Eastern' is, in proportion a still smaller affair. As our correspondent justly remarks, it is only as if a drunken pilot had run the ship ashore. A particular invention, which it is succeeds will economize heat and prevent it from incommoding passengers, has failed. It has failed we are told, and been given up often before. So the question lay between enterprise and caution, and, as often happens, the builders of the 'Great Eastern' ventured to try the experiment with their paddle-wheel funnels, in spite of the protest of their engine maker, but took the safer course with those of the screw. As it turned out, discretion was the better course The warning of the engine maker was not groundless, and should have been followed with all five funnels. But from first to last the progress of steam has been a succession of experiments often very disastrous, and sometimes fatal to the inventors.

Of course there is something to blame, and, if we do dwell an instant on the fault, it is simply because everybody will anticipate us. The stake was too great for the introduction of such a risk as this appears to have been. Experiments are proverbially made upon trifles; and even the Collins Company and others had thought their ships too valuable for this experiment. It is like trying an Armstrong gun at short range, not against a sandbank, or a bit of masonry, or an iron shield, but at once against a magazine, and so jumping to the most terrible conclusion. The experiment was here tried not only on the grandest scale, but in the very place where a failure would be most disastrous—in the tunnel passing through the gorgeous ladies' saloon. Every one must have admired the rather oppressive magnificence of that apartment, where all that was not glass was the most gorgeous decoration. Every one, too, must have lamented the apparent necessity for breaking the area of the apartments with a large solid mass in the middle. True, it was so disguised by mirrors that one could not tell where the room ended. None, however, but the most initiated visitors could have imagined that in the centre of the room thus glassed and garlanded with an infernal machine. As inch or two behind these glasses was a huge steam boiler constructed on the most dangerous principles. You might as well be smoking a cigar in a powder magazine. The reflection you saw there had a spectral import. It was like the hideous jest of the pistol gallery at a French fete, where if you hit the button the showy dame turns into a skeleton. It was an overnight, we have been told, in the original plan of the ship that the funnels were not placed in the bulkheads, so as not to interfere with the open spaces. It it was necessary to place them where they were, there would arise an evident necessity for surrounding the funnel with every possible non-conductor. The invention described seems spacious enough, though it is evident that when all depended on precisely the same quantity of water being admitted at one end of the apparatus as was let out at the other, the calculation ought to be very nice indeed.—At one end the water would have to be admitted cold from an open reservoir; at the other it would have to be forced into a boiler at high pressure. The danger consisted in the difficulty of making the two operations keep exact time. Of course, both could be regulated, and no doubt there were regulators. Was the contrivance imperfect, or did the man at the post neglect his duty? Pilots have slept before now, but this man's post was more critical even than a pilot's for he had the safety of the whole ship in his hands, without check or correction.

There is just a look of the same error of judgment, the same risky experimenting, the same trusting to appearances in that other disaster, so strangely coincident in the tidings, though it happened three months ago, on the other side of the world. There was good reason for caution; no notice had been taken of the announcement sent in by the Plenipotentiaries; the batteries had been rebuilt, they were masked, and all was sullen silence. Surely this was an occasion for a reconnoissance; possibly we shall hear that one was tried. Had the force of the enemy been discovered the position might probably have been turned, as has been always before done in China. However, all seem to have gone on, trusting to that audacity which has so often worked miracles, and found themselves suddenly exposed to a destructive fire from batteries manned by 20,000 men. Three ships lost and nearly 500 men killed and wounded,—and most probably the greater part of them in standard vessels, admirate a great battle, a great defeat. Seven officers were killed, 17 wounded, the Admiral among them.—All this proves what indeed all know—the difficulty of dealing with people who appear to have no fixed ideas of peace and war, truth and falsehood. Lin kept in his drawers and never sent to Pekin the Treaty of Canton. What if the treaty extorted last year with such difficulty, and in spite of such evident duplicity, should never have been permitted to reach the Celestial City? If we are to deal with these people at all, and bring them to reason, it must be by some stronger process than words. A sort of delicacy has hitherto prevented us from showing ourselves at Pekin. It is there that we must negotiate. Our allies will probably be ready to send for this purpose a larger force than they seem to have had on the recent occasion, for they would hardly like dragging her with him. The distance which she had thus to pass was not less than 500 paces, but they reached the opposite shore in safety." Four days' hard riding, and only a cup of coffee! Flying with her husband from the Austrian army, after the great French treason of 1849, she landed with him at Mesola, and died shortly afterwards on the beach.—Life of General Garibaldi.

THURSDAY, OCT. 20th, 1859.

The Reform Convention.

It has been decided to hold a Convention of Reformers at Toronto, on the 9th of November next. Measures have been adopted for the furtherance of this object, and for the election of delegates. By a circular fr m one of the Secretaries of the Convention—W. McDougall, Esq., M. P. P., we learn that the initiatory measures in each county have been left with the member of Parliament representing it, when on the opposition side, and to some prominent member of the party—the Reform Candidate at the last election, for instance—when such is not the case.—Consequently the opening task devolves upon our member, Mr. Short. We observe the movement has been taken up with much spirit in the western counties. We have been anxiously waiting to hear the call from the proper quarter for district or Township meetings, or a general County meeting, for the election of delegates to the Convention from this county, yet we can hear of nothing being done. For what reason, we know not, but hope no further delay will be made, as no time can be lost. By reference to the circular from the central committee at Toronto, we learn that it was thought expedient to choose at least one delegate from each municipality in the Province.—While, however, the object of the Convention is to elicit the feeling throughout the country, it is thought proper not to limit the number of delegates too stringently, and therefore we are told any number not exceeding five may be sent from any given municipality.

There can be little necessity for us to offer any remarks as to the solemnity and importance of the movement. All parties have long felt the necessity for some action of a practical nature in reference to the political affairs of our Province. We notice, what rather surprises us, by the way, that not only the opposition journals of Canada West, but also the organs of the Ministry in the Lower province, look on this movement with a degree of favor.—We look on the discussion of changes similar to those which will doubtless come under consideration at Toronto on the 9th proximo as a matter of the greatest import, and we hope all parties will endeavor to bring to their aid all the calmness and deliberation which the subject demands. That the time has come for some decisive action, no one who has watched the progress of events for the last five years will for a moment doubt.

GUNPOWDER PLOT.—A Mystery.—A somewhat mysterious and singular affair took place on Saturday night last, by which, it is asserted by some, it was intended to "blow up" the Saloon of Mr. Caisse, on Water street. Mrs. Brown, the lady in charge of the Saloon, heard a noise around the building about midnight, and on looking out of the upper window, saw a man "beating a retreat" from the front steps. She gave chase to the conspirator, but he was evidently too supple for the old lady, and got out of sight. On returning, she looked about the house, fearing the man had been up to mischief, and discovered something on the steps. To her awful astonishment, on examining the parcel she found an 8 lb. bag of blasting powder, and a large fuse! But the parcels were firmly tied when found, and the disciple of Fawkes had certainly chosen a very bad quarter of the building for his operation, if he intended to do anything serious. As we said before, it is a strange affair, and like many other mysteries, may take a long time to unravel.

To the Public.

We have an appeal of no ordinary degree to make to the public on this occasion, on behalf of our respected fellow townsman, Mr John Robertson, who lost so heavily in the fire of the 13th. Mr. Robertson has been a resident of the Town for 25 years, during which time he has done much for it as an individual, and taken a prominent part, in his own unassuming style of life, to shape the destines of one now thriving and prosperous municipality. Mr. Robertson, finding himself advancing in life, has within the last few years worked unceasingly and earnestly to place himself in a position less dependent on the world, and had accumulated the small property which was so quickly snatched from him, leaving him in a predicament which he cannot without assistance overcome. We are glad to know that a subscription is being put on foot, and persons appointed in the different Wards to canvass; and we predict for them a cheerful welcome and a liberal response.

A Fire Company.

Shall we have a Fire Company? That is the question! and the time has come in earnest to its consideration. We cannot recall past disasters and misfortunes, but experience teaches us that with fitting precaution, we may avoid a recurrence of calamity. We stated last week that the ravages of the late destructive fire could have been stayed had the Town been supplied with an efficient Fire-Company, and we repeat the assertion. The want of water in the well has been raised as a bug-bear by certain individuals upon whom the blame of negligence has been placed, in not having the engine in proper trim. We cannot accept any such excuse. Those present will remember the bungling that took place in connecting the hose, by parties who done their best no doubt, but who knew comparatively little about the work they were at; the suction pipe being placed in the well without the "basket" or sieve, as a matter of course when the engine was got into motion, gravel and mud in place of water issued from the pipe. When the onlookers noticed this the cry was raised that the well was "dry" and to be sure the engine was dropped. Another hitch:—When the Hook and Ladder cart was brought on the ground, several of the ladders were missing, and useful service prevented thereby. Had an efficient Fire Company in all its departments, been at the scene of disaster in a reasonable time of ec the alarm, the flames might have been confined to the stables; at any rate much property would have been saved. When we demand of the Town Council the immediate consideration of the subject, we only reflect the wishes and demands of the inhabitants of the Town.—"Delays are dangerous," and we hope our Council will not leave this work for their successors next year. The whole Town may be in ruins before that time. If it is a fact that a fiend is in our midst scattering fire-brands let us ask also is the next victim? We await the action of the Council with anxiety.

In looking over our exchanges we find the following interesting item in the Orono Sun, the editor of which apparently was an eye witness to the burning of Mr. Palmer's Livery Stable in Peterboro' on the morning of the 5th inst:—

"What surprised us in connection with the affair was, the stolid indifference of the inhabitants. When we arrived at the scene of the conflagration, there was a large number of people standing in the adjacent street looking on, with their hands in their pockets as if they had never seen a fire before and wished to observe the whole phenomena of the affair. One solitary individual, who we suppose was interested in the matter, was breaking the sash to save it from burning, but with this exception no one appeared to dream of staying the destroying element. On our way to the fire we met the only fire engine the town possesses, which was being dragged away as we supposed to save it from being scorched, but as we afterwards learned, because the company had fallen out with the corporation and refused to work it. We said this was the only engine; there was, however, a garden engine manned by boys, which did its quota in stopping the fire. The young sters took it off some where, filled it with a few pails of water, and brought it back to play on the flames. They did this several times over, and we should think filled the grown up boys with shame. On the whole it was a rich scene. The blazing buildings, the crowd of gazing people, the boys with their squirting apparatus, and an enterprising daguerreian artist vainly endeavouring to take a picture of the fire—for fear we suppose there would never be another in Peterboro. We hope there will not, for if it happens before the boys become men, and the wind be favorable, the inhabitants may feel pretty certain their town will be burned down.

THE FIRE INQUEST.—The Coroner's Jury on the great fire have not yet terminated their enquiries. We purposed publishing the evidence given before the Co oner, but under the circumstances, we de er doing so at present.

Victoria College.

In accordance to public notice posted through the Town a public meeting was held in the Wesleyan Church in this Town on Monday night. The object of the meeting was to lay before the good people of this Town and vicinity, the claims of Victoria College. Addresses were announced to be delivered from Dr. Stenson, President of Conference, and the Rev. S. S. Nelles.

Rev. Mr. Lanton introduced Dr. Brown who had after much entreaty consented to take the chair.

The chairman regretted that so small a meeting on so important a subject, should be had. Touched upon the importance of a religious education being united with a secular one, reverted to the influence of a pious teacher in his own case, and presented the claims of Victoria College upon the Methodist body, and considered that with a membership of 40 or 50,000, it should be placed in an efficient state of operation.—Referred to the noble efforts made in Australia and Van Diemen's Land by the Wesleyans, where they had built and sustained Colleges like the one at Cobourg, and trusted the people of Peterborough would not be behind in the good work.

Mr. Rutherford spoke next, said he entirely sympathized with the movement that was now making in reference to the aid sought for Victoria College—that within 3 or 4 months he had made himself better acquainted with the subject—understood more about it—maintained that Victoria College was now sectarian in its character. It was a denominational College, not a sectarian one. There was quite a difference between denominational and sectarian. Did not intend to make a speech, especially as there were others present who would lay the matter before the meeting better than he could, and concluded by declaring his convictions that Victoria College was worthy of all the aid bestowed on it by the Government.

Mr. White was next called upon and stated that in the early part of the controversy he did not know what cause to pursue but as editors of newspapers cannot be neutral in questions coming up before the public he had the difficulty of his being a voluntary in principle and opposed to Government supporting religion, in the way of his educating the projected aid to Victoria College. But on maturer reflection he was satisfied that Victoria College was got sectarian in its character. There was quite a difference between sectarian and denominational, which he illustrated by comparing University College when in the hands of the Church of England and Victoria College, the former then requiring subscription to the 39 articles, and the latter no test whatever. Pointed out the importance of an institution while it disseminated pious literature yet required no test from the student. The importance of pious literature in the country was shown by reading an extract of a report written by the Rev. Dr. Strachon in 1826, that Victoria College was founded by the Methodist body and received its charter in 1836. The exclusive character of the University of Toronto left them no other course and it reflected to the credit of the Methodist body, to build and carry on the College. It was founded on Christian principles, to disseminate literature on Christian principles. Not sectarian in its character, not clerical, as out of nine trustees only three were clergymen; open to all classes in Canada to receive a liberal education. He maintained that an institution so liberal in its character, dispensing pious literature on Christian principles should share equally with other institutions any funds that are available. He apprehended no danger from the cry that had been made that if you once be at to make the appropriation of the College funds the Catholics will come in for the largest share. He objected to the Legislature granting small sums to denominations, thus demolishing them; but let Catholics and Methodists come down with a report of their educational establishments, and their pretensions, and they could then demand funds from the Government.

Dr Stenson said that though the meeting was small it was great in the effects produced. After the clear statements made by Dr. White in reference to the history of the colleges, he did not intend touching upon that ground. He was satisfied that it was information and facts we disclosed, we should have the entire community with us. It was all important that we make correct statements that will bear the test of second. We are engaged in promoting a christian education, and he was happy to state that at the more favourable point it was alluded to on this subject than formerly.—When such men as the Earl of Carlisle Lancaster Hall and Dr. Chalmers, advocated the cause of education a much sounder public opinion obtained. We live in a time when antiquated institutions will be swept away. Education to be worthy of the name must embrace the whole man, physically intellectually, and morally. A man may be educated as an arithmetician or mathematician and in all the useful sciences but unless his training is regulated by moral culture, his education fails to fulfil its chief object. His powers for doing evil is increased, unless his moral principles have a right direction.

These views are increasing around us.—Education based upon religious principles is now generally advocated. We are met to-night to promote this education. Explanations have been made clear by our excellent friend Mr. White. This is not a ministerial question; some people say that it—that we intend thereby to get more power for the ministry. It is nothing of the kind. Laymen have as much interest in this question as we have. If I send my son to Victoria College, I have to pay as much as any one else. I believe that no church on earth gives so much by power as our church. Witness the number of leaders, local preachers, many of whom are highly esteemed for their unrequited labour. The trustees too have great power. Though I as President of the Conference, would go into that pulpit and preach doctrines contrary to the gospel as held by John Wesley and taught in his sermons, I would not be tolerated. I repeat it, there is no church that gives so much power to its lay members as this church. There is a better balance of power in our church than in any other. This then is not a ministerial question. We do not connect political views with our College, though we have a right to our political views as well as any other. We have about 400 ministers, about 50 000 common suffrages and a out four times as many adherents.—We have in the College, Presbyterians, Church of England, and Free Church.—The principle of voluntaryism has been tried in reference to Colleges in England and the United States and it has failed to do the work of carrying on Collegiate education. Some few and noble exceptions have been named in Australia and Van Deiman's Land and elsewhere; there were Colleges endowed by private munificence. But these were all exceptions to the general rule. I wish that voluntaryism would do the work we have in view. But voluntaryism cannot do it, and therefore we appeal to the Government. We ask for a grant from no new fund. We want a fair share of the £22,000 a year, the present income of the Toronto University. We seek therefore to get your voluntary aid backed by a grant from the University funds. A bright a glorious future was before our country, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Our country presented the most direct route to the east to Japan and China, and the time was not far distant when the travel thither would be through our territory. A country in every respect second to none in Europe save Russia. Abounding in agricultural wealth waiting only the sturdy muscles of the yeomanry to develop its resources. I love a country when most of its inhabitants are yeomen. We ask your assistance in this good work.

Mr. Lanton would remind the meeting that we were very much in need of help.—Victoria College is £800 in debt; a debt not contracted for Wesleyan's alone, but for the Province at large As the object sought was most Catholic in its character, we therefore could appeal to the public to assist in paying off the debt. Though the present meeting was small he would gladly take the names of any who would pay any sum however small, by the 1st of January next. After the collection was taken up, and the benediction pronounced the meeting broke up.

In New York tea has advanced about 2 cents a pound on the strength of the reopening of the Chinese war.

Some of the students of Harvard College have formed a total abstinence society.—It was organized on the 3rd inst.

On Wednesday evening last there was found in one of the coaches on the Richmond and Petersburgh Railroad the large sum of $40,000. The owner was found and the money handed over to him.

The King of Prussia, says a letter from Berlin of the 10th inst., has become so much better that his Majesty is able to get up every day, and even to walk without assistance.

By a recent discovery gas can now be manufactured from water, coming only from 30 to 50 cents per 1,000 feet, and giving a much stronger light than gas manufactured from coal, &c., and is free from smoke or odor.

ARRIVAL OF THE "NORTH BRITON."

THE ZURICH CONFERENCE OVER

PEACE CONCLUDED!

A CONGRESS TO BE HELD.

WARLIKE PREPARATIONS IN FRANCE.

Quarrel between Sardinia and Rome,

THE LEGATIONS STILL IN REBELLION.

COMMERCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FATHER POINT, Oct. 26.

The steamship 'North Briton,' from Liverpool on the 5th inst., passed this Point at three o'clock this morning. The steamship 'Europa' from Boston, arrived at Liverpool at one a. m. of the 4th. The 'Anglo-Saxon' fr m Quebec, arrived at seven p. m. on the 3th.

THE ZURICH CONFERENCE.

All the six plenipotentiaries were present at the Conference on the 3rd at which the articles of peace were read over. The Paris 'Patrie' re-asserts that the peace really will be signed within a few days at Zurich.

The treaty will confirm the cession of Lombardy, and contains a settlement of the Lombardy department.

There will be three instruments of peace; the first between France and Austria another between France [Austria?] and Sardinia, and the third between the three Powers.

Central Italian affairs are to be settled by the Congress.

It is asserted in Paris that the Austrian Government consented to reduce the debt of Lombardy to accommodate Piedmont from $40,000,000 francs to little more than half that sum.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The London 'Times' has another sharp editorial on the San Juan difficulties. It regrets at Gen. Scott's mission to the Pacific, and treats in a peaceful solution of the question.

The Directors of the 'Great Eastern' has finally decided that the ship shall not go to South mpton, but leave Portland on her trial trip, Oct. 8th, arriving at Holyhead about the 9th. If the trial is successful, it is still intended to despatch the vessel to America on the 20th.

The London builders' strike continues unadjusted.

The 'Times' says that the agents of the French, Austrian, and Sardinian Governments have been soliciting tenders from the leading English iron founders for a very large number of rifled cannon.

FRANCE.

The Emperor remains at Biarritz till Oct. 10th, and will stop two days at Bordeaux en route to Paris. Another speech is anticipated at Bordeaux.

The French army of occupation will winter in the peninsula. Marshal Niel on joining the troops at Toulon, issued an order of the day, which was construed into an intimation that peace was not likely to be long maintained.

The Paris flour market had been animated, and advanced 2f. per sack. Wheat is also dearer.

The London 'Herald's' Paris correspondent says that nothing is heard on every side but preparations for war. He gives a similar picture of operations in Austria and Sardinia.

A Paris telegram of the 4th briefly announces that Mr. Gibson, the American Minister, died on the 3rd of apoplexy.

A Paris letter says that the King of Belgium's visit to Biarritz, made to arrange the Belgium debt to France, was a failure.

ITALY.

It is asserted that the Pope on hearing the answer that the King of Sardinia gave to the deputation from the Romagna, ordered that the Sardinian minister at Rome shall be to d red his passports; and it is further reported that at the news of the cessation of all intercourse between Rome and Piedmont, a collision between the Swiss and central stations took place at Catolica.

The Paris correspondent of the London 'Times' says Italian affairs are approaching a crisis, and refers to the circular of the Sardinian Government, and quotes the order of the day just issued by General Fanti the Commander-in-chief of Northern Italy, which promises that the tri color of Italy, preceded by the old cross of Savoy, will precede them in the fresh battles, and will for ever free Italy from the stranger.

Garibaldi has also issued an address, summoning the Italians of the Legations to arms.

A collision is shortly expected, and some think it will be produced by the Papal troops invading Romagna.

Liverpool breadstuffs had a declining tendency, and prices were slightly lower except for corn.

Richardson, Spence & Co. report flour quiet, and 6d to 1s lower. Wheat declined 2d. Corn quiet, but steady. Some authorities say breadstuffs generally are slow of sale, and unchanged.

In the Liverpool provision market beef was steady. Pork dull and steady. Bacon quiet. Lard steady and better demand.—Tallow firm.

In the London market, breadstuffs dull and steady. Corn firm, and considerable business in floating cargoes.

LATEST MARKETS.

Liverpool.—Breadstuffs quiet. Provisions quiet.

London, Oct. 5.—Consols 95⅜ to 95⅞ for money, 95⅜ for discount.

EXILE OF THE POPE.

From the editorial correspondence of the Courrier des Etats Unis:

"Pius IX. has abandoned the project of interfering by force of arms in the affairs of the Legations, but in revenge he has manifested a fresh and more energetically than ever, the intention of abandoning Rome, and accepting the asylum offered to him in the Balearic Isles of Spain. This voluntary exile of the Chief of Christendom will be a fact of which it is easy to appreciate the gravity, and France is exerting her utmost influence to prevent it. Our Ambassador to the Holy See, M. de Gramsmont, has just arrived in Paris, for the second time, in less than a month, to make the Emperor thoroughly acquainted with the real state of things, and to receive instructions how to to act in imminent crisis. It is mainly owing to his efforts that blood has not flowed in the Romagna, and that the Pope is still in the Vatican; but we are informed that he is the bearer, in behalf of the Holy Father, of a sort of intimation from which there is no hope that Pius IX. will recede. If the astute ness of Napoleon III. should be insufficient to get rid of this last and most decisive complication, we are on the eve of the most solemn crisis in the history of Europe."

The San Juan Difficulty.

From the London Times.

The Treaty of 1846 put an end to the "Oregon question" by declaring that the boundary between the British territories on the north and the American on the south should be determined by the 49th parallel of north latitude, a condition on which may naturally appear both distinct and final. It happened, however, that the debateable ground did not terminate with the mainland of the continent. At a short distance from the point where this line struck the coast of the Pacific lay an island of considerable value, and as the boundary had been carried right over the straits and across this island it would have cut off its southernmost headlands and a certain small portion of its territory. This was naturally considered undesirable by us, and the claim in question, being in fact Vancouver's Island, was left in the undivided possession of the British, although its southern angle fell below the 49th parallel. After that point had been settled, it became necessary to provide some new boundary in place of that which had been abandoned, and it was then determined that it should run due westward from the point where the 49th parallel struck the coast, should thence be carried to the middle of the channel separating Vancouver's Island from the continent, that it should there be deflected to the south and that it should be thus continued, still along the middle of the said channel, to the Pacific Ocean.

This was a very fair and reasonable decision, but it unfortunately involved an ambiguity in one of its essential terms.—The "channel" between the island and the continent was neither a single fair a simple sheet of water. In its course was situated an island or a cluster of islands, and so left one channel towards the east and another towards the west. The question the diplomatists had to settle in their particular interests will not be thought surprising, and accordingly this fresh bone of contention soon became visible.

Although, however, these differences of opinion were entertained, the Governments of the two countries displayed much laudable wisdom in their proceedings on the occasion. The disputed point was left to the conveyance of commissioners, and in the meantime forbearance was to be exercised by the authorities on both sides. Since four years ago the views of the American Government on the matter were decently expressed in a despatch from Mr. Secretary Marcy, to Governor Stevens, the chief officer of the Union in the territory of Washington, immediately adjacent to the districts in dispute. In this document no American Minister observes:—"The President has instructed me to say to you that the officers of the territory should abstain from all acts on the disputed ground which are calculated to provoke any conflict, so far as it can be done without making the concession to the authority of Great Britain of an exclusive right by force, or exercise complete and exclusive sovereign rights within the justly disputed limits." It is obvious that nothing could be more rational or statesmanlike than this view of the case, and it is only a pity that the "settlement of title" was not finally concluded before an accident could occur to disturb so prudent a compromise. This, however, was not accomplished; and now the mail has brought us intelligence that the Island of San Juan has been occupied by a small detachment of United States' troops, whose commander has proclaimed the absolute sovereignty of the United States over its territory.

We are still without any sufficient information of the circumstances in which this proceeding originated. The pending claims to this little island will not have been allowed to sleep; for it is said that, in 1854, the civil authorities of Washington Territory assessed the district taxes on property in San Juan and even made seizures to recover the amount of their levies. It appears, however, that, in July last, the American residents in the island (only 30 in number) complained grievously of the attacks of the Northern Indians, and prayed a petition to General Harney, the chief military officer of the United States in those parts, for protection against such assaults. Whether this petition produced the movement in question, or whether the resolution has been previously adopted, we cannot say, but sometime during the month of July a detachment of the 9th United States infantry, 66 in number, with three brass field pieces, landed on the island, and on the 27th of the month, the Captain in command of the detachment, acting under the authority of General Harney, issued the order in which the whole territory is claimed for the United States without hesitation or reserve.

It was under these circumstances that the proceeding was brought to the knowledge of Governor Douglas, the Queen's representative in British Columbia. He, too, is an officer has acted with great prudence and judgement. He could not, of course, forego the acknowledged claims of his sovereign, but has he had no reason to suppose that the U. S. Government contemplated any departure from its avowed policy, he wisely decided to consider the despatch of Mr. Secretary Marcy as of more importance than the order of General Harney.—Accordingly, though he made a formal communication of the facts to the Legislature of Vancouver's Island, and gave the necessary instructions to the British officers under his command, he still assumed that the Government of Washington was not cognizant of the proceedings, and took every step to prevent the misunderstanding from becoming worse while reference was made to the supreme authorities at home. We sincerely trust that this policy may be successful, and that the two governments may discern in the affair only a motive for proceeding with greater expedition in that equitable course of settlement to which they both assented. We shall not follow the local journals in their estimate of the value of the island, or the comparative importance of the possession to Great Britain or the United States. It is not a question of convenience, but of justice. The decision should depend upon the terms of the Treaty, fairly interpreted, and it was evidently not doubted by either Government a short time ago that this interpretation could be discovered. If, however, it should prove that the existing convention cannot be so applied as to satisfy the contracting parties, there can surely be no reason why two States which have now adjusted their respective limits across an entire continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific should not complete the work in the narrow waters of Vancouver's Island. The Americans may assure themselves that in such negotiations they will meet with no feelings but those of fairness and amity on the part of this country. It would be hard indeed if children of the same stock, who can read the same lines of history and listen to the same glorious old songs, should find much difficulty in adjusting a petty boundary question on the coast of the Pacific.

THE PHILOSOPHY of PUBLIC DEBT.

From the New York Tribune.

Great is the mystery of debt. There are few things that afford a philanthropic and intelligent mind a more curious and instructive subject of contemplation than the incidents of our neighbors. It is so hard to understand how the debts of our neighbors could have got credit to such an amount! It shows an amiable simplicity, such a trusting credulity on the part of the tributaries to their fisc, that literally relieves one's faith in human nature. Raising the wind has been an art—nay, a science—cultivated from the remotest ages, thought has wasted like most others, until this old age of the world," as Lord Bacon terms modern times, for its supreme and more exquisite perfections. When the notion first took root in the human mind that it was a fine thing to get hold of somebody else's property, though its restoration was secured by all the fiery terrors of most cruel laws, is not clear. But repudiations, ebbins, stoppes, slavery, and death itself, were not sufficient to quench the sanguine confidence glowing in the unpresumptuous bosom of the ancient world in the advantages of debt. The same, or similar, securities which have hedged about the fascinating pursuits in later times, have equally failed to produce a dread of entering upon it. Indeed, the great discovery of the modern science of commercial economy seems to be considered the making debt, under its alias of credit, the basis of the superstructure—too often a castle in the air—of its prosperity.

But the crowning glories of the science of borrowing have been reserved, as was fitting, for the kings and princes of the earth, within less than two centuries. It was always a puzzling thing to the Edwards and Henrys of the heroic age of our history too, to raise the wind necessary to keep the sails of the ship of state filled, and the navy were often reduced, like other pikers, to buy favorable gales of any Lapland or other witches that offered them for sale. The Jews were an exceedingly valuable portion of the subjects of those heroic monarchs, worth twice their weight in moidores. Henry III., for instance, hypothecated "his Jews" (Judeos nostros) to the sum of 3,000 marks to the Earl of Cornwall giving him full power to extort the same by distress on their goods or bodies. But in those days of darkness the moneys necessary to carry on the Government were raised within the reign or the king, by stock or crook, by farming out the revenues, by anticipating the taxes by a forage by pawning the royal jewels. Every generation, on an average, paid its way in some sort. It was not until the other day, as it were, that the bright idea gradually dawned upon the financial mind of borrowing money and bequeathing the payment of the same as an heirloom on posterity. And this brilliant invention did not spring fully grown, and armed in all its stratagems, from the laboring brain of any one European financier. It grew up from small beginnings to its present gigantic proportions and, like Virgil's Amor, has got as eighth as well as size by running.

"Ingrediturque solo, et caput inter nubila condit," and lifts its head above the clouds while walking upon the earth. And it has made the trade of governing much easier than it used to be.

Viscount Goderich, now Earl of Ripon, by the death of his father, moved, awhile since, for a return of the whole amount of the National Debt of England and Ireland, which was duly laid on the Table of the House of Commons before the prorogation. It is not as formidable in point of size as some of the Blue Books which strike terror to the heart of member and constituent, being only over a hundred pages long; but they are pages crammed full of the very quintessence of English history. It is an abstract and brief chronicle of the fighting which the nation has indulged in, on its own account and others, for the last century and three quarters. It is a record how

"Mortgaged States their grandsires' wreaths regain'd,
From age to age in everlasting debt."

For the National Debt of England is a monument of war—a military trophy—which would never have existed had it not been for the fighting, pro visions or necessities, the amount inflicted for any other purpose being entirely unconsiderable and unimportant. The first legacy of debt bequeathed by a king to his successor was left by that most rebellious king, Charles II, and amounted only to the paltry sum of £664,263.—Indeed it might be regarded as less than a farthing, as this sum was the amount granted by Parliament in payment of near three millions which had been advanced by the Bankers and other capitalists of London, on pledge of the taxes, and of which they were cheated by the cutting up of the Exchequer in 1672, and in consequence of which many of them were ruined. So that in point of fact, the nation or his Majesty at least, was a clear gainer by the transaction of more than two millions, although the small consideration named above, with 3 per cent interest, remained a charge on the Excise at the time of the more lamented death of the Merry Monarch.

The restitution of 1688, and the establishment of William and Mary on the throne of James II., was accomplished with only a trifle more than two millions being added to this small nucleus of the English debt. But at the beginning of the last century, the war had raised the amount to £14,000,000. Then the wars of Marlborough and Peterborough, undertaken for the reduction of the Grand Monarque to his proper place and due weight in the balance of power, ran it up, at the time of the treaty of Utrecht, to the figure of £20,000,000 more. As much more was added to the "tottle of the whole" by the short war with Spain, ending in 1721, which left the debt at £54,000,000. The administration of Sir Robert Walpole, under whom "the Empire took peace," reduced this sum which our immortal aberation thought considerable, by £8,000,000. But the war of the right of search with Spain, into which he was hobbled by Pulteney, Carteret, Sandys, and the rest of them, but which did not save him from "sinking into insignificance and earldom," soon swallowed up that poor thrift, and left the debt at the end of the war swelled to the round sum of £75,000,000. It was at this time, 1756, that Johnson wrote the lines just quoted, about mortgaged States regaining their grandsires' wreaths, and he, doubtless, thought that sum was as much as the nation could stagger under. Yet he lived to see it more than treble, when the accounts were made up in 1784, the year he died, of the cost of the American war. But as he had proved taxation to be no tyranny, it was perhaps of the less consequence; and besides, the mother country had grown in stature and substance in proportion to the load laid upon her, so that she could well sustain it. Even as he held that the Colonies had, in the sentence of his pun libet which the Ministry attacked with such severity, as too bad even for a parody, are to be preserved," in which he thought the objection that the Colonies had never been taxed before—"we do not put a calf into the plough; we wait till he has become an ox!"

It is time now to admit, that the shoulders of the English nation grew gradually accustomed to the increasing weight laid upon them, as Milo was enabled to carry a bull on his shoulders by beginning with him when he was a calf. But to return to a hundred years since. The Seven Years' War which added Canada to the British possessions, and relieved the colonists from their old haunting fears of French conquest, about doubled the debt, as it stood when it broke out. Our revolutionary war, which followed as a corollary to the last again about doubled the double sum, making it, in 1784, about £240,000,000. This was extremely a fearful sum on the life-blood of Britannia, which it was apprehended might produce syncope and death. But the strength of her constitution was not known then, nor until the twenty years' war against the French Revolution showed how much more plethoric she could bear. At the time of the peace of 1815, the fingers of her debt not content with being doubled as on the two previous occasions, insisted on being quadrupled, or nearly so. They then represented the incomparable sum of £860,000,000! And, inasmuch as it was thus inflamed for the purpose of annihilating the Napoleonic dynasty, we must say that it does not look just now as if the money was well expended. The long interval of peace in Europe, until the Crimean war, produced this astonishing sum by about one hundred millions. But that war, in less than two years, rest red one-half this saving to the gross total, which now stands at £805,000,000. One particular observable in this growth of the debt, is the fact that the interest on it has diminished as the principal has increased. At the beginning of the last century, when the debt was in its infancy, eight per cent was the figure at which it could be negotiated. Now that it has grown up to its present enormous corpulence it can get all its wants for its comfortable sustenance at three or three and a half per cent. Thus the beautiful simplicity of the "three per cents," for which Sidney Smith sighed, is the blessing of a comparatively recent disposition.

This circumstance alone should allay the fears of those alarmists who see ruin and bankruptcy in this national indebtedness.—For it shows the confidence of capitalists, the most sensitive of human beings in such cases, as to the sufficiency of the debtor to carry the amount. Then it is to be considered how immensely the wealth of England has been increased during the forty-five years since the battle of Waterloo. The manufactures of that nation, encouraged by their own sagacious self-interest, helped by our Pro-Slavery tariff, have almost grown up since then The amount that has been added to the national wealth by the improvements in machinery and its multiplication since that time, is probably equal to that of the national debt. Foreign commerce is vastly greater than then, and internal commerce and intercourse has received an impulse from the introduction of railways, which has multiplied it beyond the former dreams of avarice. The eight hundred millions for which the English people are now responsible is really a less heavy burden, taking into consideration the increase of population and wealth, than the seventy-five millions of a hundred years ago. And, as we have seen the occasion of this disease, the cure is plain. The cessation or unfrequency of wars, the diminution of the armies of Continental nations, from necessity if not from principle, and the consequent reduction of her own establishments would alone provide the means of extinguishing the national debt of England in less than a century.

Canada vs. All England.

As soon as the great superiority of the Eleven against any Twenty two of the continent became apparent, it was suggested to the Hamilton Club that the strength of all Canada should be played in the ensuing match on their ground. The proposal was accepted, and the following names are an authentic list of the players chosen to contend against the English professionals:—Bayley, Bestord, Hardinge, Dykes, Gillespie, Pickering, Foudrinier, Fisher, Harris, Bayley, Heward, Jones, Parsons, T. D. Phillips, H. Phillips, Read, Rogerson, Eykert, Sharpe, Starting, W. Totten, H. Totten.

If all the gentlemen thus chosen to represent the strength of all Canada can unite against the common enemy, there is still some hope of all their differences being settled.

As soon as the Eleven have fulfilled their engagement at Hamilton, they will proceed to Rochester, where arrangements are in progress for a match between them and the United Clubs of Canada and America.—Thus it will be seen that Toronto is finally excluded from all participation in the matches, and we recommend those desirous of seeing the English Eleven to visit Hamilton, and not stay at home under any supposition to the contrary.

The Spectator gives the following as the list of the Twenty-two, but the first we believe to be th correct one:—Pickering and Smith, Montreal; Parsons, Heward and Reid, Toronto; H. Totten and W. Totten, Brantford; Jones, Brockville; Starling and Despard, Belleville; Worswick, INSURRACTION IN VIRGINIA.

Great excitement—United States troops and Volunteers ordered to the Scene of Disturbance.

BALTIMORE, Oct. 17.—The evening train on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad has just arrived here. Its officers confirm the statements first received touching the disturbance at Harper's Ferry. Their state ment is to the effect that the bridge keeper at Harper's Ferry, perceiving that his lights had been extinguished went to ascertain the cause, when he was pursued and fired upon by a gang of blacks and whites. Subsequently the train came along when a coloured man who acted as assistant to the baggage master was shot, receiving a mortal wound. The conductor, Mr. Phelps, was threatened with violence if he attempted to proceed with the train.

Feeling uncertain as to the condition of affairs, the conductor waited until daylight before he ventured to proceed, having detained the train six hours. Mr. Phelps says the insurrectionists numbered two hundred blacks, and that they have full possession of the United States Armory.

The party is commanded by a man named Anderson, who had lately arrived at Harper's Ferry. Mr. Phelps also confirms the statement in a previous despatch, that the insurrectionists had seized a waggon and loading it with muskets, had despatched it into Maryland.

The military of Frederick has been ordered out.

Despatches have been received from President Buchanan ordering out the United States troops at this point, and a special train is now being got ready to convey them to the scene of disturbance. He has also accepted the volunteered services of Capt. Renick's Company of Frederick, and has likewise ordered the Government troops from Old Point Comfort, to proceed immediately to Harper's Ferry. The intelligence is authentic.

3 o'clock, p. m.—The train going west got as far as Sandy Hook, when Mr. Hoof the baggage master, and their party, started on foot for the bridge. They went through the bridge, and were taken and imprisoned, but subsequently went before the captain of the insurrectionists, who refused to let anything pass. All of the eastward bound trains long west of Harper's Ferry have been taking persons from this side of the river, tying them together and taking off the slaves. The mail train bound westward has returned to Monocacy. From 500 to 700 whites and blacks are concerned in the insurrection. The United States Marines are under orders for Harper's Ferry. There is great excitement in Baltimore, and the military are moving. Several companies are ready to take the train which will leave soon.

4 p. m.—An account from Frederick says a letter has been received there from a merchant at Harper's Ferry, sent by a boy who had to cross the mountain and swim the river, which says all the principal citizens are in prison and many have been killed also that the railroad agent had been shot twice, and the watchman at the depot been shot dead.

Washington Oct. 17. 4 p. m.—The intelligence from Harper's Ferry Orders have been issued for three companies of artillery at Old Point Comfort and the troops of marines at Washington barracks to proceed to Harper's Ferry without delay. The marines, 93 in number, left in the 3.15 p. m. train with two twelve pound howitzers and a full supply of ammunition. It is reported that they are under orders to tear the bridge to-night at all hazards. Col Faulkner accompanies them.

Baltimore, Oct. 17. 5 p. m.—A train filled with military, including the Law Greys, City Guards, Shield's Guards, and another company left here at 4 o'clock for Harpers Ferry.

7 p. m.—A despatch from Martinsburg, west of Harpers Ferry, received via Wheeling and Pittsburg confirms the report of the insurrectionists having possession of the arsenal and Harpers Ferry, and says they have planted cannon at the bridge.—All the trains have been stopped A body of armed men were getting ready to proceed thither to clear the road. There was great excitement at Martinsburg.

Washington, Oct. 17, 9 p. m.—It is suggested by well informed persons, that the cause of the insurrection is the reported fact that not long since the contractor for the construction of a government dam at the Ferry absconded, largely indebted to several hundred employees, who have taken this step to indemnify themselves by seizing the Government funds which it was supposed were transmitted thither on Saturday.

A gentleman just in from Harper's Ferry thinks the blacks participated in the outbreak only on compulsion.

TWO MEN SHOT.

We are sorry to have to report a most serious and unaccountable affray, which took place yesterday evening at the Royal George Hotel, kept by R. Geddings, at the head of Spadina Avenue, by which two men were seriously injured, although we have reason to hope not fatally. It appears that, some time before nine o'clock p. m., three men—Edward Lowder, Florence McCarty, and another (whose name has escaped us) went to Gedding's Hotel for the ostensible purpose of playing a game of billiards, but afterwards changed their minds, and entered into a game of bagatelle with the landlord, Geddings. After the game had proceeded some time, it seems that Geddings fancied that the other men were cheating him, and accused them of doing so, which they denied. This dispute, as usual, brought on high words, and from high words they came to blows, until at last three men, Lowder, McCarty, and the other, made their way to the door, when Geddings snatched up a loaded double-barreled gun and fired both barrels at them as they were going out. The charges took effect upon two of the men, Lowder and McCarty, who were so seriously wounded that they had to be carried to the surgery of Dr. Agnew, in York street, who extracted the shot. Geddings afterwards came to the police station and surrendered himself. Mr. Sergeant Major Ferris went to Gedding's house after wards, and found the double-barrelled gun re-loaded and capped. Geddings declared that "he would shoot any one, again, who came to his house in that way." The matter will be brought before the police magistrate this morning.—Colonist.

In Hadley, Mass., the tobacco crop which has just been harvested is valued at about £50,000.

SAN JUAN.—At San Juan there were three British and four American men-of-war. A number of English and Americans on hearing of the dispute, started for San Juan. A report that a British steamer had opened fire upon the American was not credited.

FRIGHTFUL EXPLOSION AT BIRMINGHAM.

EIGHTEEN PERSONS KILLED, AND MANY WOUNDED.

Yesterday a terrific explosion occurred at the percussion cap manufactory on Messrs. Tursall & Phillips, situated in Whitehill street, Birmingham, which was attended by an enormous loss of life.

It appears that the firm had large orders on hand, one of them from the Turkish government being for 18,000,000 of caps, had a considerable number of persons employed in an extensive range of shopping at the back of their premises. It is supposed that there could not have been less than 80 persons, the majority of them being women and girls, at work yesterday morning, when the accident occurred. Nothing is at present known regarding its origin; it is supposed it took place in an apartment where the caps are primed with the detonating powder, and where there were five females employed.

This room was situated in the third store of the shopping; immediately beneath was the work-house, where a larger number of women and girls were employed; and in immediate contiguity were others engaged in various operations connected with the manufacture. They were all busily at work, when in an instant, a terrific explosion took place.

Windows, walls, and roofs, were hurled into the air, and the unfortunate workpeople scattered in all directions, or buried under the ponderous masses of material which lately formed the buildings. Scarcely had the wreck subsided into a chaotic heap before fire added to the horror of the scene, the timbers of the building having become ignited by the intensity of the explosion.

The persons engaged in the front part of the building, who were comparatively uninjured, rushed to the windows, and were rescued from their perilous condition by the mult tude who had been attracted to the spot by the noise of the explosion. A fearful spectacle then presented itself to those who had the courage to make their way through the burning building.

Eight or ten girls were seen half buried in the ruins, chiefly with their heads downward; whilst others whose legs were crushed under the debris, stretched out their arms, piteously imploring for assistance; cries were heard from those whose position could not be seen. One elderly woman sat on a beam unable to extricate herself as another piece of timber lay across her legs An effort was made to rescue her, but the burning building was falling in all directions and she had to be left to a horrible fate. Scarcely had she been left when part of the roof fell in with a terrific crash, and she an some girls in her vicinity were immediately crushed to death.

An alarm had been conveyed to the fire engine stations, and the brigades were speedily at work. It was an hour or two however before the fire had been got under and it was impossible to institute a search for the poor people who were known to be amongst the ruins. The result was no 7 o'clock last night, no fewer than seventeen bodies had been recovered. All were so shockingly mutilated and disfigured as identity was impossible except in a few cases. Most of them were the bodies of girls from 10 to 19 years of age.

Seventeen, who were more or less injured, were taken to the General Hospital, one man died on a cab as he was being conveyed there. About one half of these patients were able to leave the hospital in the course of the afternoon; but five remain the institution in very precarious state.

We may add, that this is the third explosion in percussion cap manufactories which has taken place in as many months.

SEDUCING EMIGRANT GIRL

Information was given by Mrs. Ann Duffy of Boston, at the Mayor's Office yesterday, to the effect that a niece named Isabella Louisa Regman, 16 years of age, had arrived in this city from Liverpool, by the ship Emerald Isle, on Friday, and had been taken away from Castle Garden to some unknown place by Samuel Lewis, the coloured cook of the vessel. Two experienced officers of the Twenty-sixth Precinct were out on the track of the cook, and succeeded in finding the girl at a low negro dance house kept by T. Sewell, No. 7 Wooth Street. They learned also that another girl had accompanied Miss Regman to this place, and subsequently left for an other. Miss Regman and the gay coloured gentleman were brought before his Honor the Mayor and questioned in regard to the peculiar conduct. It appeared that Lewis the cook, who is more than ordinarily good looking for a coloured man, managed to gain the affections of the young girl on her voyage hitherward, and under the promise to marry her, took her to the above den—a business in which he is said to have long been engaged, and for which he is paid by the proprietors. The cook was sent to the Tombs for examination on the charge of abduction, and the girl was detained as a witness. There are two more of these pups on the packet ships among the sailors and petty officers, by whose agency the dens of Water, Cherry, Oak and Baxter streets are constantly recruited. The poor girls are debauched on shipboard by sailors and subordinate officers, and arrive here covered with shame knowing not where to go, and fearing to face their friends. Thus they readily follow wherever their paramours lead, and thenceforth vibrate for the remainder of their lives between these dens of infamy, the Police Court, and the Penitentiary, till the pauper hearse at last comes and carries them to the Potter's Field.—The commissioners of Emigration do all in their power to check this evil, by preventing misses from taking the girls away; but they are frequently foiled by the girls being rowed ashore in small boats, instead of landing at Castle Garden, according to law.—If shipmasters would aid Commissioners, much of this debauchery might be abated.—Tribune.

TOUCHING INCIDENT.

An affecting occurrence took place about a week ago in the neighborhood of Milan. The Certosa (as the name indicates) is a Carthusian monastry, situated at a distance of fifteen miles from Milan, and between that city and Pavia. The church, a monument of rare beauty, teeming with costly treasures and noble works of art, is a constant object of attention to all travellers visiting that part of Italy. The monks, to the number of thirty-two, are subject to the severest discipline, and are never even allowed to speak, except on these rare days when in accordance with their statutes, a faint ray of comfort is suffered to steal in upon the solitary gloom of an existence dedicated to prayer and bodily mortification. A body of French officers, on a visit to this remarkable spot, had obtained leave from the superior to attend vespers, which are performed every afternoon at three o'clock, in the magnificent choir of the church by the whole monastic body. One of the visitors was observed to fix his eye on the countenance of a monk, who was like the rest, engaged in the act of chanting the service.—Suddenly, to the surprise of all present, he sprang forward with a cry, caught the monk in his arms, and strained him to his bosom in a long and fervent embrace. The monk was in fact a brother, lost for many a year to his family, and supposed to be dead.—The Carthusian sobbed aloud, but faithful to the rule of his order, which prescribes absolute silence, held his peace until a signal from the superior permitted his over straining emotion to find relief in words. By a special relaxation of the society the brothers may meet again twice before the departure of the regiment, to which the one is attached separates them anew and forever.—Correspondent of Herald.

IRELAND AS IT WAS AND AS IT IS.

The Rev. Thomas Edgar, one of the Irish deputation, gave a lecture last evening in the large hall of the Cooper Institute, on Ireland as it was and as it is. The hall was nearly filled. He commenced by a repitition of the often repeated fact that the population of Ireland had considerably decreased. The famine had its uses. It sent forth a multitude of strong hands to this country, who in seven years sent back $37,500,000 to bring over their relatives. Ireland relieved by the famine, rose to remarkable prosperity. In 1848 and 1849 one-third of all the population of Ireland were in the work-houses. Now there were but 50,000. In 1849, 145 men were hanged in Ireland; in 1854 there were but four hanged. There were three times as many Englishmen hanged in the nation now as freshmen. Agriculture had received an enormous impetus. Millions of acres had been reclaimed.—In 1857 the cattle of Ireland were valued at $80,000,000 more than they were three years before. In 1857, Irish capital had increased $19,000,000 over what it was in 1853. In 1857, there was 1,926 miles of railway. In 1829 there were 2½ millions of letters; two years ago there were 21 millions. In 1800, Ireland had 372 newspapers; in 1845, 145. In 1852 there was in 74 towns not a single bookseller. The Rev. Mr. Edgar spoke of the beneficial working of the Encumbered Estates Act. Under this Act one seventh of the surface of Ireland was sold in three years. The men who formerly burned the barns of others now had barns of their own. One man was paying £60,000 a year in wages to persons employed on his estate.—But while there had been a great average increase of consumption of luxuries in Ireland, the consumption of spirits had considerably decreased. The moral condition of the country was also vastly improved.—N. Y. Paper.

INAUGURATION OF BROCK'S MONUMENT.

QUEENSTON HEIGHTS,
October 13, 1859.

The Field Battery of Hamilton, Capt. Harris, and No 1 Rifles, Major Grey, and number of other companies from Hamilton arrived at the monument at 11 o'clock in the ground were assembled officers of militia from every part of the Province. about 12,000 persons in all were present. Shortly after 2 o'clock Sir Allan M'Nab, accompanied by Gen. Wilkinson and staff made their appearance on the platform, in front of which the several rifle companies were drawn up, when the Hon. gentleman delivered an eloquent oration suitable to the occasion, which was most enthusiastically applauded.

Gen. Wilkinson having been loudly called upon said he was indebted to his friend Sir Allan M'Nab, for the invitation to be present on this occasion, and the pleasure experienced in being here. It was gratifying to any British officer to observe the loyal spirit exhibited by the people as exhibited in the attendance of so many of the veterans of 1812, and of the militia of the present time, which clearly proved to the Queen and the Empire that, should they require it, their services would be available. Pointing to the monument, he said as being there was a conclusive proof that the services of able Generals were appreciated by the people, and it must be gratifying to the feelings of those who bore hereditarily commission, assuring them that their fellow citizens would reward their merits. He hoped that no occasion would be afforded him to see who ther he could not like Sir Isaac Brock, hold the country against a foreign foe; but if it were he could happy and proud to lead such men as those before him. He concluded amidst prolonged cheering.

Col. L. W. Thompson then briefly recounted such particulars of the battle of Queenston Heights as had come within his own observation, concluding amidst much applause.

Col. Duggan then spoke warmly in praise of the Militia, coupling the names of Colonels Thompson and Dennison.

Col. Roland M'Donald addressed Sir A. MacNab, and said it was not a little singular that the spot where Brock fell was not marked even by the monument, and proposed that Sir Allan should place a stone to mark the place. Sir Allan replied that he thought he knew nearly where the spot was, and would consult with those who knew better than he and have a stone, surrounded by an iron fence to mark the place.

COMMUNICATION

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—The meeting advertised for Monday night was held in the Methodist Church. If that meeting be taken as index of the feeling of the Methodist body in this Town and vicinity in reference to Victoria College, sharing the University funds, then assuredly may we say that the people here are not in favour of the spoliation scheme put forth by certain dignatories in that body. So thin a public meeting I never saw in that chapel. The people of the gallery were requested to come into the body of the church, so that it might appear that there was a meeting. If I should say fifty souls were present I should not be charged with underrating the number

Dr. Brown occupied the chair, and after stating the object of the meeting and pointing out the advantages of a religious education, he called on Mr. Robinson Rutherford.

Mr. R., did not intend making a speech but he heartily sympathized with the movement on foot in regard to Victoria College. He had within three or four months made himself acquainted with the matter and it was all right.

I used to think Mr. R., an out and out Reformer, a man who went with the movement of 1847, condemning the division of the University funds, and an ex-chartist to boot. Now how comes it, when the people rights are about to be invaded by one sect, he sympathizes with the movement.—True in 1847 the Tories were for dividing the funds of the people a College among four denominations. Mr. R. among the rest thought it was not right then. Now it is right if the Methodists walk in and take their just share. Has our friend's politics taken a turn, or is wrong in 1847 right in 1859. He was glad there were two champions present, the President of the Conference and the "editor of the Review. and no hearing the matter to them he sat down.—Mr. White being called made some general remarks touching education and governmental grants, when he and took to give us the history of the University of Toronto, While he once in a while stumbled on facts, it was evident he was in a tight place, he did not know the history of the Peoples Colleges Read a extract from Rev. John Strachan's report on the importance of a religious education, but we did not hear what report it was; whether it was the one he laid before the Home Government when he succeeded by false statements to get the charter of our College for his own church. It was written he told us in 1826 and I strongly suspect it was said report. He looked upon Victoria College as an institution entitled to the support of government, for it was not a sectarian College, though he dwelt upon the "pious literature" taught in it. He could easily define the difference between a sectarian College and a denominational one, and he did so by referring to the time in 1826 when Victoria College was founded. The University then demanded the subscription to 39 articles of the Church of England from a student ere he could gain admittance.—Victoria College though built and owned by the Methodists, exact no test from students about to enter it. But Mr. White should have told us when this test was enacted from University students. It was while it was in the hands of the man and his party who robbed the rightful owners of their property. Victoria College he said was founded on account of these very extortions, and when the proposal is before the country of dividing the fund of the University among the denominations, the party who now clamour for a share of its funds, (I mean the Conference as a corporate body through the Connexion) although it was proposed to give them less than fair share.) As it was but a short excuse for a meeting, Mr. White might have felt he was beating the air.—Certain it is I never heard him fail worse in making out a case. I shall reserve any more remarks on the meeting to a future occasion, with your leave, I may again hold forth. Meantime, I am

Valuable Property

FOR SALE,

On Liberal Terms of Credit.

BY

PUBLIC AUCTION.

WILL be sold on the premises, in the Town of Peterborough, on

Wednesday, 2nd Nov., 1859

at the hour of Two o'clock in the afternoon—By virtue of a Power of Sale in that behalf, contained in a certain Indenture of Mortgage, dated the Fourth day of November, A. D., 1857, and made by John Glen of the Town of Peterborough in the County of Peterborough, Merchant, of the first part, and Harriet Glen, his wife, of the second part, and George Coupar and William Ogilvy of the said Town of Peterborough, Merchants, of the third part; All and singular those certain parcels or tracts of land and premises, being Town Lots, Numbers Three and Four south of Sherbrooke Street and West of George street, in the Town of Peterborough, together with all the houses, buildings and erections thereon, and all appurtenances thereunto belonging.

The above property is situated in the flourishing town of Peterborough, and is within two hundred yards of the Port Hope and Peterboro' Railway Depot, with which a connection could be made at a trifling cost. There is a large and substantial building on the property, which was built and fitted up for distilling purposes, but never having been used, could be turned into Flour Mills or any kind of Manufactory at a comparatively trifling expense. It is particularly adapted to either Distilling or Brewing purposes on a large scale, as it contains all the Tubs, Shafting, Coppers, works and Machinery necessary for that business, constructed on the most approved principles. A considerable stream running through the premises furnishes a never failing supply of water, and might readily be used in connection with steam as a motive power.—There is a new Engine and Boiler in the building which cost $2,000. These are of the most approved make, are very powerful, and have never been used. The Out-houses are well built, and are capable of Stabling two Hundred head of Cattle. Altogether the property will be found one of the most desirable investments for Capitalists, Manufacturers or others to be met with.

TERMS OF SALE,

One fourth down, and the remainder in equal payments, at ONE, TWO and THREE years. For further particulars apply to

$100 A YEAR,

AND upwards saved to the Farmers by ALDUS MOWRY'S

CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but an old amount of power to drive it, two horse-power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 10 to 2 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are affixed into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and re-sharped at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

☞ All orders directed to "M. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.

The inventor, Aldus Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.

Address, "Aldus Mowry, Peterboro', C. W."

N. B.—Any persons infringing upon this Patent, will be prosecuted to the utmost extent the law will allow. Patent dated March 16th, 1859.

PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE
BETTER THAN
EXPERIMENTAL SCIENCE.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE UFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilised alike, has proved that simple eruptions, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developments of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of inflammation and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and pe manently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and using as a dressing, this inestimable Ointment.

Scrofula Erysipelas, and Salt RHEUM.

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysipelas, can long withstand its influence.

Bad Legs, Old Sores, and Ulcers

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Eruptions of the Skin.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic disease, are eradicated, and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative design of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Piles and Fistula.

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede his application. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Breasts,
Fistula,	Sore Heads
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Stiff ins,
Piles,	Stiff Joints,
Rheumatism,	Tetter,
Ringworm,	Ulcers,
Salt Rheum,	Venereal Sores,
Scalds,	Wounds of all kinds.

☞ Caution!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London" are discernible as a Water-mark in every leave of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

 Sold at the manufactory of Professor Holloway, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in pots at 25 cents, 63 cents, and $1 each.

☞ There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are affixed to each pot.

Selected Poetry.

The Stormy Sea.

BY DELTA.

Ere the twilight hat was flitting,
In the sunset, at her knitting,
Sang a lovely maiden sitting
Underneath her threshold tree;
And, as day-light died before us,
And the vesper star shone o'er us,
Fitful rose her tender chorus—
"Jamie's on the stormy sea!"

Warmly shone that sunset glowing;
Sweetly breathed the young flowers blowing
Earth with beauty overflowing,
Seemed the home of love to be,
As those angel tones ascending,
With the scene and season blending,
Ever had the same low ending:
"Jamie's on the stormy sea!"

Curfew-bell a remotely ringing,
Mingled with that sweet voice singing;
And the last red ray seemed clinging
Lingeringly to tour and tree:
Nearer as I came, and nearer,
Finer rose the notes, and clearer;
Oh! 'twas heaven itself to hear her—
"Jamie's on the stormy sea!"

"Blow, ye west winds! blandly hover
Over the bark that bears my lover;
Gently blow, and bear him over
To his own dear home and me;
For, who might winds bend the willow,
Sleep forsakes my lonely pillow,
Thinking of the foaming billow—
"Jamie's on the stormy sea!"

How could I but list—but linger,
To the song, and near the singer,
Sweetly wooing heaven to bring her
"Jamie from the stormy sea;"
And, while yet her lip did name me,
Forth I sprang—my heart overcame me—
"Grieve no more, sweet, I am Jamie,
Home returned to love and thee!"

THE STAR OF THE NORTH.

Among the events which may well be styled "the Romance of History," none are more surprising—incredible, indeed, were it not for its actual existence—than the elevation of the Empress Catherine of Russia, from a peasant girl, to share the throne of the great Czar Peter, to whose intellect, and enlightened views of his country's real good Russia owed her commencement of civilized habits, and true notions of a nation greatness and happiness.

We propose now giving a slight sketch of the manner in which this strange transformation was effected, and the cause, which we are told, led to it.

In a quiet village, near Wyborg, on the Gulf of Finland, in the commencement of the eighteenth century, might be seen, one bright summer's morn—bright even in those cold regions—a group of workmen engaged in various trades, but, at the moment we allude to, reposing from their labors, and taking rest and refreshment with their families.

There was, however, one exception, in a man of powerful frame and striking features whose brilliant, restless eye, and quick movements, betokened no eager, nervous, and strong passions, who was working eagerly at his trade, that of a carpenter, and mixing little in the jests and conversation of his companions, till the appearance of a man bearing a basket of smoking pies caused a general exclamation of pleasure, and even caused the industrious Peter, for such was his name, to rest for a few moments, and watch the general rush to the welcome visitor.

One of the men was [illegible] out money apparently, but, undaunted [illegible] offered a glass of the country's favorite beverage, schnik, to the pastry cook, whom they addressed as Danilovitz.

"That will do excellently," said the man swallowing the draught: "but where is the handsome vendor of that capital Dantic? I don't see her here."

"Oh she is not out yet; she is still with her brother in the cottage; and a word in your ear, comrade—I'ster, there, is in love with her. See, he waits he now; but I suspect he has no chance, poor fellow."

The man alluded to evidently heard, for a gust of strong passion swept over his features; but they heeded him not, and, filling their glasses, drank to the great hero of the age, Charles the Twelfth of Sweden—all but the pastry cook, who declined the toast and drank instead, to their own Czar Peter in spite of the clamour of the assembly.

"He is right, I will stand by him," cried Peter, advancing, and placing himself at the side of the pastry cook.

A general scuffle was about to take place which would have led, perhaps, to fatal consequences, had not the dockyard bell summoned the workmen, and, with a good natured offer of renewed amity, they rushed off, leaving Peter and his ally alone.

"You like Finland, friend Muscovite?" said Danilovitz.

"I should have died on my first arrival, in a paroxysm of rage, to which I am subject," replied the Russian, "but for the help of a gentle girl, who lives not far from hence."

"Ah they say true, then, that it is for her love you work in the dockyard, where she so often comes to sell her Dantzic, and go to her brother each day to play on the flute the sister's favorite ballad?"

"And, were it so, how dare they talk of my proceedings? And who are you, that presume then to question me?"

"Like yourself, a Muscovite. I mean to return to my own country, and offer my services to Peter."

"To that savage brute?"

"Yes; his heart is good, I hear, and his soldiers adore him, and I would go to death at the sound of the sacred march which his guards played at Poltowa, and he himself composed."

"Well, you shall accompany me, for I, too, mean to return."

"I will follow you, brave countryman, and if I rise not to be a general, it shan't be for lack of courage. But I must go forwards for the present. And the pastry cook departed.

"He may be useful to me," mused the cunning carpenter; "and indeed go I must. But Catherine—how can I leave her? Shall I bear him her favorite pledge, her favorite air. I must reply."

A few days after this date brought the brother of the young countryman to his door.

"My sister is gone out on my affairs," he said, "and my very life hangs on her success."

"How so, my friend? Confide in me; I will be secret," replied Peter very anxiously.

"You know that we came from Ukraine" returned George, "and from our mother inherit but her music and her magic power, and yet I have dared to love Prascovia, the beautiful niece of the rich old innkeeper, till my very reason is almost lost in the madness of my passion. And yet I dare not ask the old man's consent; and Catherine more brave than I, has gone to plead for me.—Come drink to my success."

"And Catherine's health," said Peter; and even as they drained their glasses, the fair girl entered

"The anxious lover can drink to soothe himself, I find," she said laughing; "then he is not in very terrible earnest."

"Nay dear sister, speak! Don't trifle with my misery."

"Confess that I am a good ambassador," replied the smiling girl; "the King of the Inn graciously consents to give you his niece, if you can find a certain sum; and with my earnings that you can manage."

"No, no, generous sister, keep them for your own dowry—I think not of marriage."

"Catherine," murmured Peter, "forget not my love—have pity on me."

"Love!" repeated the beautiful girl, scornfully, "which you quarrel, drink, indulge in all, I warn you against. You love me not."

"Confusion! death!" exclaimed Peter, another of his fiery gusts convulsed his features.

"Catherine, it is partly your own fault," interceded her brother George; "you should be more gentle and kind to him."

"Listen," said Catherine, with a lofty earnest air, which gave her beauty a singular elevation. "Remember you not your mother's prediction on her death-bed, that my natal star shone brightly towards the north, and that there some one of transcendent merit and power, should both love and share his might and fortune with me; and when," she added, turning to Peter, "I preserved your life, and saw a something in your eye and bearing which spoke of a different race to our humble class, I deemed the prediction might be verified in you."

"And why not think so still?" inquired Peter, anxiously.

"It matters not; I speak no more."

"I will know, I insist on your speaking!" exclaimed he, imperiously.

"That tone is too much your habit," said Catherine proudly. "You have no right to speak thus to me. In aught but this imperious will, you are vacillating and weak; you will never rise to greatness."

Peter's fury increased, his clenched hand and flashed eye might have awed any but the proud Catherine

"So," she said, "I brook not such insolence."

At that moment the trio were startled by the sudden entrance of the pretty Prascovia, breathless and trembling with terror and the speed with which she had run to them.

"My love, my bride, what has alarmed you?" cried George, clasping her in his arms.

"The Calmuck!" she gasped; "they are plundering our inn. My uncle has fled! Save me, save me!"

"Quick, let us fly!" said George, preparing to collect any loose articles they might carry with them.

"Not so" said Catherine quietly; "do you not recognize in these intruders our mother's kindred of the Mesanni? Fear not; I will save you. Leave all to me."

And the brave girl left the wondering trio, and encountered the disorderly band, about to attack their cottage.

They stopped, astonished at her bold calm demeanor.

"With draw!" she cried, "or woe to you if you brave me. Revere the memory of my mother, the saint Wlasta."

"Our own prophetess!" they cried in surprise.

"Yes; woe to him who honors not her memory. Enter, if you will, but respect the laws of hospitality. Come let us raise our song, and with music and dance celebrate our meeting, far from our native land."

And with a rich voice, she began herself the national hymn, and placing herself at their head, led the fascinating band of wild adventurers away.

"Thank heaven!" said George. "And now I will go to prepare all for our wedding at the church. While you, dearest go to your uncle. Haste for in such lawless times, only the present moment is our own."

And the lovers left the cottage, on their respective missions.

"Brave, noble girl she is worthy of her desires," muttered Peter. And, at that instant the fair heroine herself appeared, pale but calm.

"I am more satisfied with you in this affair," she said, in answer to Peter's enthusiastic praises. "You controlled yourself; I acted according to the dictates of prudence Had you but a true friend always near you, you might ——"

"I have no friend," interrupted Peter.

"And I?" she murmured.

"You have rejected me, Catherine."

"As a husband; not as a friend."

"Thanks, gentle maiden. I am indeed miserable, and need a friend and counsellor.

"Listen," said Catherine. "Nothing is impossible to him who has a strong, inexorable will. Greatness may still be yours, if you but find your right vocation. If you would win glory, fame, and my hand, go seek all at the cannon's mouth; my heart, my prayers will be yours. Go, make a noble a reputation, and then come back and claim your bride."

"You words inspire me, noble girl; the thought of you will be my talisman. To my love I shall first pay my duty. Farewell. I go to [illegible] Peter, with one loving embrace, he departed.

Catherine remained lost in thought, and her calm, though quiet mien troubled that the cool pastry cook at last [illegible] of all to remain? said George.

"Danilovitz, [illegible] brother of the young countryman to his door.

"My sister is gone out on my affairs,"

And the bonny bride-groom went off to complete his toilet for the occasion.

"Here, dear Catherine," said the bride-elect, "here, in a letter your lover, the bargemaster, gave me privately for you. Read it while we wait."

Catherine read, and her face grew troubled. "My sister, this is sad news for us both. The Cossacks have imposed a conscription on the village; and, if we cannot find a substitute for George, the very evening, he must leave as a recruit."

Prascovia burst into tears. "This evening—our wedding day? Oh, Catherine my heart will break!" and she threw herself into her sister's arms.

Catherine's brow was grave, and she was silent for a moment or two; then her resolution seems to be taken.

"Be comforted, my sister, he shall not go."

"But how avoid it?" sobbed Prascovia; "no, no, there is no hope."

"I know a substitute," said Catherine firmly, "one who might pass for him, he is so like. I go to secure him; be not surprised if I do not return in time for the wedding; but fear not, he is safe. Trust in me." And he hastily left the cottage.

An hour or two later, the village was gay with the bridal procession of George and Prascovia; while, even as the rites were performing, the doomed recruits marched to the spot where they were to embark. And among them, wrapped in a large mantle, stood a slender form, who gazed from the jetty on that gay group, and murmured, "Mother, I promised to watch over my brother's happiness. Be content, I redeemed my vow.

* * * * *

We must now follow our heroine to the Russian Camp, where the usual wild excesses of rude troops in idleness were practised, and where her delicate frame had to bear the heavy toils of a recruit; and all the embarrassments of her disguise were equally frequent and difficult to escape from without discovery, more especially as the leader of the Cossacks, who had invaded her native village, and to whom she had, in her mythic character promised fortune and advancement, was there, and now a sergeant in the Imperial Guard; and Gritzenko came upon her one day as she was singing, in her rich voice, the Czar's Sacred March.

"That tune is forbidden, young man," he said roughly.

"That tune—the Czar's own March?" she repeated.

"Yes, our colonel has ordered that no one shall sing or play it."

"But tell me, young man, who are you?"

"Why do you ask?" said Catherine; what matters it to you?"

"Because you are strangely like a handsome cantinere I saw at Wyborg, in Finland not long since; voice, features are all the same. I can't comprehend it."

"She was my sister," said Catherine, aping her face to hide the rising color.

"Ah, that explains it. Well, she was right; she told me I should soon be what I now am, a corporal of the guard, nothing less."

"And you get six copecks a day don't you?"

"Oh sometimes, thirty, forty; always twenty every night."

"How? Explain."

"Listen, and I will tell you the strange mystery. One night I was complaining of the Czar's order to shave our beards, when an officer passed by, and threw a scroll containing twenty copecks into my hand Next parade, he passed again, and asked 'Have you fulfilled the order?' I said, 'As well as I could;' and he gave me thirty copecks; and again, last night, forty. Oh, it is wonderful luck!"

"And what was the order?"

"I do not know; I can't read; but I have kept the scroll, and here it is."

Catherine read, "Corporal Gritzenko shall be rewarded for ever soldier he can induce to join our project." "Good heavens!" she murmured, "what project?"

"Quick, give me the scroll!" said the Cossack. "Salute; here comes our colonel."

And Zernitoff and a brilliant suite came up as the two soldiers presented arms.

"Go, corporal, and inform the captain that the general will soon hold a review."

And Gritzenko departed.

"Gentlemen," said Zernitoff, know you that the Czar has sent an edict extending the punishment of the knout to the highest officers."

"Death to the tyrant!" "We will not brook the disgrace!" Better death, itself! were the exclamations, not loud, but deep, which answered him. Zernitoff spoke a few words to Gritzenko, and then with a well-pleased smile, went off with his friends; while the corporal proceeded to deliver the order to Catherine to stand sentinel, with another soldier, over a tent which had been prepared for two noble officers.

She took her station, little dreaming of the occupant it was about to receive.

Two hours later, and Peter himself, Danilovitz, and the General of the Camp, were assembled within its folds; and the latter, under strict injunctions to frustrate the Czar's incognito, was dispatched to make arrangements for the arrival of two bodies of troops, hourly expected, to save the disaffected Cossacks; and the two guardian friends were left alone.

Peter's vice was, it is well known, the love of intoxicating liquors, and he lost not the opportunity of indulging it, favored by the administrations of the accessories to his taste by two pretty vivandieres belonging to the camp. And Catherine, from her post, peeped into the tent from time to time unnoticed, and her anticipated, and jealous forebodings both [illegible] its accomplishment and its unexpected [illegible] with the young girl's sister waited on him.

Presently, [illegible] her spell-bound, she [illegible] call, dressed up the apparent drunkards, who ordered to deliver a letter to the Commander Peter.

"How now, fellow, [illegible] "Quite unconscious [illegible] "This must be delivered to [illegible] the guard."

"I will see [illegible] Catherine replied [illegible] "This [illegible] "I must [illegible] "Good [illegible]

[illegible] Peter alone and thoughtful as when we introduced him to our readers, but not now in the dockyard of Wyborg, but in an apartment of the palace at Moscow do we find him; the only trace of that past episode of his life being the axe and workman's jacket which he had worn, and on which he loved to gaze, as associated with her loved memory. Danilovitz, too, the quondam pastry-cook, was now a colonel, high in the favor of his imperial master, since to him he could speak of his lost love, and speculate on the probability of her return, or rather discovery in her retreat, if still alive.

He was, as we [illegible] sitting thus lost in thought, when his favored servant entered.

"Sire," he said, "I trust I bring you news of her you mourn. Catherine is, I believe, not dead; indeed; I know it, though, perhaps, lost to you."

"How?" exclaimed the Czar, "a rival—death!"

The reply of Danilovitz was protracted by the entrance of the Corporal Gritzenko, who, with many apologies and troublings, informed the Czar that eight Finnish carpenters demanded to pass into the city.

"Admit them instantly; for all that comes from Finland pass unquestioned."

The man bent low but still lingered.

"What more, speak?" said Peter impatiently.

"Your Majesty, pardon; but your Majesty will remember the young soldier who so imprudently gave the a blow, and whom I tried to shoot in the fight, but failed."

"Villian! was it then I Out of my sight!" thundered the Czar; and the trembling corporal retired, fully persuaded that the want of success in shooting the young fugitive enraged the Czar, and prevented the intended [illegible] for [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

FREE TRADE vs. PROTECTION.

Quotation from New York Times.

Mr. John A. Dix delivered the Annual Address at our State Fair last Friday, and followed the time honored precedent of other Democratic politicians in making that address subservive a partisan purpose. We are not aware that a like abuse has been committed by men holding opposite views—no one can say it has not been usual on this side. If it is to be continued, we insist that Protection and Free Trade shall both be heard, and that each shall have its turn.

Mr. Dix's leading proposition is set forth by him as follows:

"During the last fifteen years, the exports of our agriculture have made a great though not a steady advance, and it may be safely assumed by agriculturists that there will be constant demand in the European market for the products of their industry—a demand as uniform as the varying productiveness of different years abroad will admit. I think it may be stated as a proposition from which the farmers of the country may draw conclusions, and by which they may be guided in their practical operations, that Europe cannot raise a sufficient amount of food for the consumption of its increasing population, and that, even with the most abundant harvests, there will be an annual deficiency, which can only be supplied by the United States."

Now, we do not doubt that Europe will take some grain from this country, especially if we continue to buy and consume largely of her manufactures. So long as we are largely clothed in European fabrics, and eat from European dishes, she must take some grain from us or go without her pay; for all we now send her, including a large amount of breadstuff and provisions do not pay for what we buy; and if these should be refused, we must sink into hopeless bankruptcy. What we Protectists hold on this point is briefly this:

1. A distant market for bulky and perishable staples like breadstuffs must be the average be a poor market. We can only sell grain in Europe by offering it at or below the prices of the grain produced there. Hence, our farmers must underwork their rivals by at least the amount of the cost of transportation, shipping, charges, &c.—Suppose wheat in the average worth $1¼ per bushel at Manchester or Birmingham, our grain growers in Illinois and Wisconsin must sell it at 37½ to 75 cents in order to hold the European market. We think they can do much better than this.

2. A distant market is necessarily a capricious market. Europe may one year take one hundred millions worth. (Witness the contrast shown by Mr. Dix between the European demand of 1846 and and 1847; witness the contrast between the reasonable expectations of our farmers last spring and the present realization.) If our fruit-growers are to be left dependent on the European market, they can never work with a reasonable presumption, that their labor will be adequately rewarded.

3. Sending grain to Europe is emphatically a wasteful operation. Nine-tenths of it goes there to pay for wares and fabrics that might as cheaply—that is with as little labor—be produced on our own soil.—Now suppose a million days work would produce a given amount of grain from our grain growing region to Europe and bring the cloth thence to the farmers, will cost another million days' work which seems to us all clear waste and loss. Plant the manufacturer [in the words of Gen. Jackson] beside the farmer, and this third million is all saved and divided between the farmers and the manufacturers. It seems to us as it did to Gen. Jackson, the palpable interest of our farmers to attract the manufactures hitherto rather than send our grain abroad for their fabrics. If there is any mistake or fallacy in this view of the matter why does not some one attempt to show it! But Mr. Dix proceeds unconsciously to adduce another and a very forcible argument for producing our fabrics and consuming our grain on our own soil. Hear him!

"The great wheat growing districts of the Union consist, for the most part, of prairies in the Western States and Territories, some of which have been centuries denuded of trees, and have yielded little else than grasses, by the decaying remains of which the soil has been enriched. But whether with or without timber the surface soil of these great plains is much the same. It is composed of the carbonaceous remains of decayed and decaying vegetation, and is usually of a depth which, to persons unacquainted with the principles of vegetation and their influence on the soil, would seem to give it an exhaustless fertility. It is for this reason that the first cultivators have gone on, year after year, carrying away the produce of the land, without giving anything back to it in compensation for the organic and inorganic elements which have constituted the food of the plants they have removed. The result has been everywhere the same. The crops have steadily deteriorated in quantity and quality. Experience has shown the expectation of undiminishing productiveness in new soils, no matter how fertile they are, to be a gross delusion.—Science explains the cause of the deterioration. Vegetables, like animals, are developed by means of the food they consume. The former draw their sustenance directly from the earth. Every crop reduces the quantity of food the earth contains, and diminishes the condition of its fertility; and, after a certain period, the capacity of the earth to produce the same crop ceases. In other words, the supply of food which the crop requires for its production becomes exhausted.

"There is but one mode of guarding against this result, and that it is by restoring to the earth the same amount of organic and inorganic matters which have entered into the composition of the crops removed. This is the universal law of compensation in every department of physical life. Chemical analysis shows that plants contain the same principal ingredients, in very different proportions. It shows also that soils, apparently similar, vary essentially in their chemical components, and that while one is better adapted to wheat another contains in more suitable proportions the mineral substances required by other grains. If the cause of the deterioration of the wheat crop in this State could be ascertained, it is probable it would be found that the soil on which it has been cultivated possesses, in a reduced proportion, one or more of the mineral substances essential to the growth of that grain, and that if the deficiency were supplied the soil would possess the original means for its production.

Precisely so, Mr. Dix! and why won't you see that the restoration you urge is eminently possible and will never take place under the galling yoke you advocate! Every bushel of wheat or corn, or barrel of flour or meal, or thread of wool or peck of peas sent abroad takes away a portion of the phosphates and other precious elements of fertility which are so easily restored. And Mr. Dix says will support nations in this country. If only one half of the people would [illegible] Canada, if squeezed by the Reciprocity Treaty, could [illegible] to increase as it has done since 1854.

The Movement.

The Reform Convention movement spreads like wild-fire, and the meeting of the 9th proximo promises to form an important part in the history of our Province. In another column will be found a communication from Mr. Short, naming the time and place for the meetings in the Municipalities, for the appointing of Representatives for this County.

Important to the Lumber Trade.

The Quebec Chronicle, a good authority, believes it is the intention of the Government to make provisions for the measuring of wany or board timber, through the office of the Supervisor of Cullers, at the earliest moment possible. That such provisions should be made is of importance to the interests of the Province. It is easily conceived that before a tree is hewed into what is called a stick of square timber, a considerable quantity of wood must be cut away. the best of the tree is thus lost, the cleanest and lightest part being that just immediately inside the sap. The proportion thus destroyed, and in which considerable capital and labor are expended, varies according to the form and size of the tree. When the tree is large, and there is a bend or curve about the middle, about one fifth is lost.—The part thus left in the woods becomes tinder to feed the destructive fires which ravage our forests almost periodically.—Where the trees suitable for being manufactured into wany timber so manufactured, the part now destroyed, would, when retained, impart an increased value to the whole, and a much less amount of capital and labor would be expended in hewing the trees. Hitherto when wany timber was occasionally manufactured and brought to market, the producer lost considerably in the mode of measurement adopted. No provisions is made in the Act 8 Vict. cap. 49, for measuring timber of this form.—The fact of no provision having been made for the measuring of it, coupled with the erroneous mode of measurement adopted when it happened to come to market, discouraged its being manufactured. And the discouragement became almost absolute prohibition, when the producer on bringing his timber to market, found that he lost from eight to twenty per cent in the measurement. All parties now agree, that the mode adopted, namely, taking the girt with a string, and multiplying the square of the quarter girt by the length of the stick, for the cubic contents, is erroneous. There is no valid reason why provisions should not be made for measuring of this kind of timber, and in making provision, a correct mode of obtaining the cubic contents should be adopted. Hitherto when wany timber was cut on Crown Lands, the woods and forests revenue was subjected to a loss of from eight to twenty per cent, by charging the timber dues on the erroneous measurement. This loss is too large to be permitted to continue. It is therefore, evident that both the interests of the manufacturers and of the Province demand, that trees suitable for the manufacture of wany timber should be so manufactured, and not hewed into what is called square Timber. The interests of the manufacturers demand it because a greater quantity and superior quality of timber will be obtained for which they will realize a higher price than if the trees were manufactured into square timber; the interests of the Province demand it because a gain will be realized, not alone of the percentage of Crown duties now lost by the waste of timber and the erroneous measurement; but also by that large addition which will be made to the value of our exports. Manufacturers will, we have no doubt, hear the proceeding in mind in getting out their timber during the coming winter.

MILITARY.—Assistant Adjutant-Gen. McDougal is on a tour of inspection of the Active Force of Upper Canada. We believe he visits Peterboro to-morrow, and the Rifle Corps will be on parade from the arrival of the noon train till the departure at four o'clock, p. m.

THURSDAY NEXT being the day appointed for Public Thanksgiving and Praise to Almighty God for the numerous mercies which this country has been favored with our next issue will appear on Wednesday evening. All advertisements, and communications intended for our next paper will require to be handed in before 5 p. m., on Wednesday.

THE FREE CHURCH Presbytery of Hamilton have decided to effect a union with the United Presbyterian church, by a majority of 20 to 9—the proposed basis they consider satisfactory.

Peterboro' Autumn Assizes

The Fall Assizes commenced on Tuesday morning, the Hon. Chief Justice Haggarty presiding. Happily but few cases appeared on the calendar and the sitting was brought to a close last night. The following is a list of the trials:—

CRIMINAL CASES.

Felix Murry, for the wilful murder of Connors in Lindsay. Verdict—Manslaughter, with a recommendation to mercy. Sentenced to 6 years Penitentiary.

George Northey, charged with Larceny. Acquitted.

John McArther, Larceny. Plead guilty.—Sentenced to 3 years Penitentiary.

GRAND JURY PRESENTMENT.

The Grand Jurors of our Lady the Queen present,—That having examined the different apartments of the Gaol, take pleasure in reporting them clean and properly kept, so far as the Jailor is concerned; but we are sorry to find them so deficient in ventilation, and would therefore recommend steps to be taken to remedy the same. They would further present, that instead of the saw-dust now used on the floor of the Court Room, the Counties Council do furnish a suitable matting.

TOWN COUNCIL.

WEDNESDAY, Oct. 19, 1859.

The Council met in special session.

The Mayor stated that he had called the Council together in consequence of a petition he had received from parties owning property in the vicinity of the late fire.

A By-law was passed extending the fire limit over the burnt district.

The Council then adjourned.

Monday, 24th October.

The Council met. Present—The Mayor, Messrs. Conger, White, Read. Toole, Bradfield, Kennedy, Eastland and Morrow.

A petition from B. Reynolds, asking for a Beer licence at reduced rate was referred to Licence Inspectors.

A Return of fines and fee, of the Police Court for the quarter ending on the 30th Sept., was read to the Clerk.

Reports from License Inspectors and Health officers were read.

A report of Fire Committee, recommending the payment of certain sums was read and adopted.

A petition from Jas. Curtis asking assistance from the Council, was referred to Committee on Charities and the sum of $20 was ordered to be placed at the disposal of said Committee for that purpose.

The Committee on Streets and Bridges were instructed to open the water course of McDonnell Street, from the Road, to prevent the water from lying in the center of the Street.

On motion, Mr. John English was appointed Fire Warden in place of Mr. A. Moffatt, and the Clerk was authorized to notify the Fire Wardens of their appointment.

On motion Mr. A. Cathcart was heard at the bar of the Council. He stated that under the present By-law he was unable to collect the proper fees, therefore asked compensation for losses sustained in consequence thereof.

The Council then adjourned.

The decrease in the consumption of spirits in Scotland for the last four years is actually £5,010,112, or nearly a fifth part of the whole previous consumption. So much for temperance lectures and social organizations.

The Rev. Lachlan Taylor, well known as a zealous agent of the Bible Society in Canada West, has just returned from an extensive tour through Great Britain, Palestine, Egypt, and other countries. Having brought with him numerous antiquities, illustrative of the manners and customs of Oriental life, Mr. Taylor purposes delivering shortly a series of lectures, embracing such topics in relation to the countries visited, as he may deem of greatest interest. Such lectures cannot fail to be both popular and instructive, when delivered by so able and energetic a speaker as Mr. Taylor.

THE QUESTION DECIDED.—We are to have no Fire Company! So rules the Council. We are not inclined to fight with the wind, nor continue the shooting in deaf ears, and so we shall drop the subject. Should we have a re-enactment of the "13th" conflagration, the public will know upon whose shoulders the blame rests.

CURLING.—We are pleased to observe that steps are taken to establish a Curling Club in our town, a meeting for that purpose is to take place at Cairns's Hotel on Monday 31st inst. We hope that those who takes any interest in the exhibitating and scientific game will be absent, especially as in an inland town such as "ours" the dreary months of winter hang heavily on their hands when not relieved by some kind of rational amusement. Under such circumstances, we trust therefore that the meeting will be well attended by the professed lovers of the sport and especially by those who have not as yet made any demonstration. Mr. James Cameron Esq., of Cobourg, will be present at the meeting. Other towns are invited to send over and if Scarboro' cannot be prepared to give all information respecting the rules of the game.

HALLOW-EVE,

Hallow-eve, or "Halloween," is fraught with its superstitions and traditions to the peasantry of the west of Scotland. Their belief is that on this evening his satanic majesty is unchained, to run at random through the country, and that departed spirits have power for a while to visit this dull globe which we inhabit; and those aerial people, the fairies, are said on this night to hold a grand anniversary. The passion of prying into futurity makes a striking part of the history of human nature in its rude state in all ages and nations, and a perusal of these strange mythics may be of some interest even to the most philosophic mind. No better illustration of a Scotch "halloween" could we give than to copy Burns' poem on this subject complete; space will not permit, however, but the following may convey some idea to the uninitiated:

"Some merry, kindly, country folks,
Together did convene,
To burn their nits, and pu' their stocks,
And haud their Hallowe'en,
Fu' blithe that night.

The lasses feat, and cleanly neat,
Mair braw than when they're fine,
Their faces blythe, fu' sweetly kythe,
Hearts leal, and warm and kin';
The lads sae trig, wi' wooer babs,
Weel knotted on their garters,
Some unco blate, and some wi' gabs,
Gar lasses hearts gang startin',
Whilst fast at night.

The first ceremony of Halloween is pulling each a stock or plant of kail. They must go out, hand in hand, with eyes shut, and pull the first they meet with; its being big or little, straight or crooked, is prophetic of the size and shape of the object of all their spells, the husband or wife,

Next on the list is the burning of the nuts—favorite charm. They name the lad and lass to each particular nut, as they lay them in the fire; and accordingly as they burn quietly together, or start from beside one another, the course and issue of the courtship will be.

Another is to steal out all alone, to the kiln, and throw in the pot a clue of blue yarn; wind it off a new clue off the old one; and, towards the latter end, something will hold the thread. Demand who holds? An answer will be returned from the kiln-pot by naming the Christian and surname of your future spouse.

A strange one is to take a candle and go to a looking glass; eat an apple before it; and some traditions say you should keep combing your hair all the time; the face of your conjugal companion, to be, will be found in the glass, as if peeping over your shoulder.

A happy one. Take an opportunity of going unnoticed, to a bean stack, and fathom it three times round. The last fathom of the last time you will catch in your arms the appearance of your conjugal yoke-fellow

Generally the final charm is to take three dishes; put clean water in one, foul in another, and leave the third empty.—Blindfold a person, and lead him to the hearth where the dishes are ranged; he (or she) dips the left hand; if by chance in the clean water, the future husband or wife will come to the bar of matrimony a maid; if in the foul a widow; if in the empty dish it fortells, with equal certainty, no marriage at all.

"Wi' merry sangs, and friendly cracks,
I wat they didna weary;
And unco tales, and funny jokes,
Their sports were cheap and cheery.
Till buttered scon, wi' fragrant lunt,
Sets a' their gabs a-steerin;
Syne wi' a social glass o' strunt,
They parted off careering
Fu' blithe that night.

ELOCUTION.—As will be seen by the advertisement, Mr. Steele has returned to town, and will deliver a Lecture on Elocution this evening in the Town Hall. The lecture will be followed by a number of select readings and recitations. To the admirers of this useful art we would say, —this is a fitting occasion to show yourselves such. We hope Mr. Steele will meet with more encouragement than on his last visit to Peterboro'.

AT WORK IN EARNEST.—Superintendent Dumble, of the Cobourg Road, advertises for 150 able bodied men to work on the filling in of Rice Lake Bridge. We are told the Directors of the Cobourg Road are bent on having this work completed by next Spring.

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—Your correspondent "J. E" no doubt enjoyed much self congratulation when he saw himself in print in the last issue of your paper, and no person I suppose would find fault with such exhibitions of his mental powers if he did not wander into the regions of fancy for a subject, and make statements that have no existence save in his own disordered political imagination. Allow me, Mr. Editor, just to ask "J. E." a question or two. Will he give the proof of my connection with Clarkish, and also with what sort of main or political principles I ever stood identified previous to the Cobourg Forgiveness Meeting? Now as these are plain questions I hope "J. E." will give plain answers, for I am thinking about the election. The charge against me is that in 1847 I advocated certain principles upon which I now contend. As to my present views in regard to Victoria College I hold that they are not inconsistent with Liberal Principles and progressive Reform. I am opposed to Monopoly in education in whatever it comes, and if "J. E." cannot bring his prejudices, political and Religious, to the examination of every question of men and measures he had better cease to set himself up for a model Reformer, as I would assure him that his milk and water position during the last two Elections has not made him good authority on political consistency.

R. RUTHERFORD.

REFORM CONVENTION.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

DEAR SIR,—I notice in your last a reference to the Convention to be held at Toronto on the 9th November next. I am glad you have thus brought the matter under the notice of the Electors of the County. Since I received the necessary papers from the Secretary of the preliminary meeting, held at Toronto, some delay has occurred in deciding the best means for securing a representative from this County. After having advised with some leading friends of the cause of Reform in Peterborough and in other parts of the County, I have decided to request that meetings be held for the purpose of appointing one or more delegates from each municipality, in accordance with the following circular, which I have addressed to a number of the leading friends of the cause, in each municipality, and which you will oblige by publishing in your journal.

SIR,—At a meeting of the Upper Canada Parliamentary Opposition, held at Toronto the 23rd September last, to consider what steps should be taken in view of the unsatisfactory position of public affairs. It was unanimously decided that the financial and political evils of the Province had reached such a point as to demand a thorough reconsideration of the relations between Upper and Lower Canada, and the adoption of such measures as would remedy the great abuses that have arisen under the present system.

To obtain an expression of the opinion of the whole liberal party throughout Upper Canada, it was resolved to summon a general Convention at Toronto, on the 9th of November, at noon, to be composed of one or more delegates from each municipality, to be selected by the friends—and those only—who approve of the present Parliamentary Opposition, and desire to strengthen their hands.

Having been appointed by that meeting to initiate measures for the selection of delegates for the County, I have decided to call meetings of the friends of Reform, as described above, to be held at the times and places hereinafter mentioned, for the purpose of selecting such delegates.

In the TOWN OF PETERBORO', on Monday next, 31st October, in the large Room in Sandy's Block.

In the Town Hall in SMITH, on Tuesday, 1st November, 2 p. m.

In the Village of ASHBURNHAM, on Tuesday, 1st November 7½ p. m.

In the Town Hall, NORTH MONAGHAN, on Wednesday, 2nd November, 2 p. m.

Town Hall, ENNISMORE, on Wednesday, 2nd November, 2 p. m.

Mahoney's Tavern, DOURO, on Thur day 3rd November, 2 p. m.

In the Town Hall, in DUMMER, on Thursday 3rd November, 2 p. m.

In the Town Hall, at NORWOOD, in ASPHODEL, on Friday, 4th November, 2 p. m.

In the Town Hall, at KEENE, OTONABEE, on Saturday 5th Nov. at 2 p. m.

At Burgess' School House, in BELMONT, on Saturday 5th November, 2 p. m.

Trusting that the above appointments will meet the approbation of the friends throughout the County, that a full attendance will be secured and that delegates be appointed who will attend the Convention and faithfully represent the views of the County.

I am,
Yours Respectfully
THOMAS SHORT.

TO THE REFORM ELECTORS OF THE COUNTY OF PETERBORO.'

GENTLEMEN,—

At a recent meeting of the Reform members of Parliament held at Toronto for the purpose of taking into consideration the present political and financial position of Upper Canada, and for devising some means by which we may remedy existing evils, and avoid the troubles which lie before us, it was resolved to call a convention of delegates of the people, to be held in the city of Toronto, on the 9th day of November next, to aid them in their labours and to afford them advice and assistance in the premises.

I think it is unnecessary for me on this occasion to enter into any lengthened argument to show you the importance of the step about to be taken, and to urge upon the necessity of your active corporation, and your duty to send delegates to represent you in your forthcoming convention. A measure of this kind is essentially a people's one, and must at all times command the confidence and support of the people. Government being established by and for the people, it is their legitimate rights, as it is their duty, to remodel and improve the machinery by means of which the business of the country is administred.

Important constitutional changes are recommended for your consideration and acceptance as your only security against the misgovernment which has so long prevailed and over which under the present system of "responsible government" as it is called, it is admitted there is no control. The effect of these changes upon the interests of Upper Canada will be great and if properly appointed, will be productive of immense benefits to the people. It is your duty, therefore to participate in the labors and to share in the responsibilities of the approaching convention each town and township and incorporated village is expected to select three delegates to represent the liberal electors therein, taking care to appoint only such as by their experience and intelligence are best qualified to deal with the grave duties which will then devolve upon them.

It is most sincerely to be hoped that the county of Peterboro; which has ever been conspicuous for its liberality and intelligence will not be behind in this great and good work, and that the approaching convention will see, among the vast assemblage present representatives from every municipality within its limits. To this end no time should be lost. The day is rapidly approaching and Reformers should be at work.

OTONABEE.

Oct., 25th, 1859.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

DEAR SIR,

Permit me to draw your attention to the injury that is being done to the Town by the careless manner of reporting the state of the markets, by the market clerk; and to suggest, that it would be better, and much more satisfactory to the trade of the Town if the Review and Examiner, would themselves, give a weekly review of the produce market.

On the last [illegible] the market clerk, under date 20th Oct. gave the price of Spring Wheat at 90 cents, and Fall Wheat $1.05, whereas the prices were that day, Spring 90 cents, and Fall 5s 7½d, about $1 42 cents. The general business of the town suffers materially by such reports, especially when they are made officially, by the clerk of the market over his own signature—Farmers having produce to sell, who reside within range of other markets, although Peterboro may be more convenient to them, and knowing the state of such markets from correct reports published elsewhere, would not, on taking up a Peterboro' paper, be induced to bring Spring Wheat here, to sell at the price quoted, namely 80 cents, when they know they could procure 85 cents at Keene, 90 cents at Millbrook, or 95 cents at Port Hope: these remarks will also apply to Fall Wheat and other articles.

This evil has been continued too long, and it is high time the market clerk should discontinue market reports altogether, or take a little trouble to ascertain from dealers, what are actually the market prices. But I may be mistaken, perhaps the figures he gives are the prices offered on the Market Square, under the patronage and working of the famous Market By-law, if so, buyers in other parts of the Town do not appear willing to be controlled by them.

yours truly,
FREE TRADE.

JOTTINGS ON A FEW SUBJECTS

Mr Editor:—I have of late been reading some of the British periodicals, and among other things I observe that the dissenters of Britain, but more especially those of South Britain, are about making another attack on the Prelatic Establishment of England, viz: to deprive her of State support, and terrific is the howl that these well-fed priests have raised against the men who believe that Church establishments are alien to the religion of Jesus. Of all corporations the Ecclesiastical is the worst, the most alien to liberty, the greatest bar to reformation. Originally at war with reason, and founded upon a perversion of Christianity, is it to be wondered at that in all ages it should be the ready tool of despotism. Is not the history of Establishments the history of tyranny—tyranny of mind at all times—tyranny of body when they dared? Is it any wonder then, Mr. Editor, that England's dissenters should grumble at being compelled to contribute to the support of a Church three fourths of whose preachers are on the down-hill road to Rome.

I observe too, that that branch of the "Society" founded by John Wesley, located in Canada West, is desirous of procuring a few "pickings" in aid of Victoria College. Verily, Mr. Editor, the Pope will have reason to thank these modest followers of Wesley for inserting the wedge, for if Wesleyans obtain State support, why not the Church of Rome? Meetings for the benefit of "Victoria" have been held in various places, Peterboro' among the number, but few attended it, as you know. I was much amused at the attempt of your friend of the Review making a speech in justification of the aid sought for the Cobourg institution. It was only equalled by his estimate of Orthodoxy in his review of the "Gospel Church," and his modesty as displayed in a late number of his paper in speaking of the Free Church Presbytery of Cobourg which lately met in Peterborough.

I see too by a late number of the Examiner that there is to be a Convention of Reformers to consider our present condition as a Province. There is really need for such a meeting. They will have to encounter in doing so the scorn of the biggot-loud and ignorant Tory: misrepresentation and contumely will be their portion. The Leader and some other patriotic prints will lead the way in this, and Demosthenes of the Review will no doubt play second fiddle; but let these bull-dogs and the cur of Peterboro' bark on. What do Reformers care for a set of spaniels who lick the hand that feeds them. "By their fruits ye shall know them." "Do men gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles?"—But I am trespassing on your space, so I will defer the rest till another occasion.

Yours truly,
JASON.

Otonabee, 21st October, 1859.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.

Sir John Franklin was born in Lincolnshire, England in 1786. He entered the navy in 1800; served as a midshipman in the action of Copenhagen, April 2, 1801; sailed on a voyage of discovery to New Holland; was wrecked in 1803; was signal midshipman in the Bellerophon in the battle of Trafalgar, Oct. 21 1805; became a lieutenant in 1808; and was engaged in arduous services in the expedition against New Orleans in 1814, where he was slightly wounded in boat service. In 1818 he commanded the brig Trent on a voyage of discovery to the neighborhood of Spitzbergen. In 1819 he started on a perilous overland journey of 5,550 miles, lasting three years from Hudson's Bay to the northwest and the shores of the Polar Sea. He was promoted. In 1825 he started for the same regions and was absent two and a half years. The Geographical Society of Paris gave him a gold medal worth $250, Oxford made him D. C. L., and the Queen made him Sir John.

From 1930 to 1834 he was in services in the Mediterranean, and for his exertions in Greece received the order of "the Redeemer of Greece." For a time afterward he was Governor of Van Dieman's Land.

May 20, 1845, under the orders of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, he sailed towards the North Pole from Sheerness, in command of the Erebus (70 officers and men) and Terror (68 officers and men) which had just returned from the South Polar Sea.

His return was expected in the Fall of 1847, but at that time nothing had been heard from him later than July 12, 1845. Eighteen or twenty vessels, English and American, have been sent in search. Lady Franklin persevered in her appeals until the public almost ceased to regard them. Her devotion has at last some reward.—Doubt is exchanged for certainty.

A CIRCUMSTANCE WITH A LITTLE MYSTERY.—Early this morning a young woman went to the Howard's Ferry dock, for the purpose of securing passage to Prescott. The steamer not being ready to start, Mr. Wells, who keeps a saloon on the wharf, with rooms for the accommodation of passengers, told her she could step into his rooms and warm herself till the boat was ready to start, which she did. A short time after one of the hands on the boat inquired of Mr. Wells "what that woman had done with her baby?" and informed him that she came over from Cobourg about three o'clock this morning and had with her an infant, apparently about three days old. The woman was immediately questioned by Mr. W. as to her home history, and where she had been, and while she was going. She said she lived in Edinburgh, C. W., had been to the post office in Ashton, and was on her return home. [illegible] appeared the case satisfied the [illegible] on the boat was correct as to her identity, and charged her with having come across in the three o'clock boat and having had an infant with her, and asked her what she had done with the child. She denied the charge, but immediately left the dock. Mr. Wells despatched a boy to watch her movements, with instructions not to abandon her track till she had entered a house some where, and then immediately report to him. The boy followed the woman to the suburbs, through divers streets, and finally lost track of her near the red house on the Heavelton road near the distillery gate. It is thought she left the child in possession of some unsuspecting person, and attempted to abandon it, or it is possible that she has put it out of the way.—Ogdensburg Journal, Oct. 15.

Arrival of the "Anglo-Saxon."

QUEBEC, October 24th.

The steamship Anglo-Saxon passed Father Point yesterday at 8 a. m. The Augusta was to sail an hour or two later than the Anglo-Saxon. The Nova-Scotian arrived at Liverpool at 11.30 p. m. on the 11th. The steamers John Bell and United Kingdom are to run between Glasgow and New York during the winter.

ZURICH CONFERENCE.

Difficulties still remain unadjusted. The delay is attributed to Austria.

The Vienna cabinet was doing all it could to bring over the French Emperor to its views, but at the same time preparing a coalition against him with Germany.

The Great Eastern quitted Portland on the 8th inst., and reached Holyhead on the 10th. The distance run during 48 hours was 550 miles. The average rate was 13 knots, though during the greater part of the time the engines went little more than half speed; the paddles averaged 30, and the screw 38 revolutions. The Great Eastern attained over 14½ knots without any exertion on the part of the engines.—Weather squally. Very heavy ground squalls experienced. The correspondent of the London Times on board ship says it is more than probable the ship will not leave England during winter.

The Government was understood to have given Napier of Clyde, orders for the construction of an iron steam ram.

Rumours were current of a split in the English Cabinet on the Chinese question.

Robert Stephenson, the engineer was in a dying state.

The builders strike has not yet terminated.

FRANCE

The Emperor has been unwell for a week malady not serious.

Peace had been signed.

Some small islands opposite Jersey are being fortified.

The immense floating battery being built at Bordeux is to have bulwork three feet in thickness.

The Paris correspondent of the Post says the Imperial Government are contemplating what measures to take to counteract the protest of the French bishops. They had received orders from Rome to preach for the restoration of Italian dukes. Napoleon is getting disgusted at the procrastination of Austria, and for the moment French policy inclines to a more intimate understanding with England.

The Univers had received a warning for an objectionable article on Cochin China.

Commercial affairs remain unsatisfactory. Flour and wheat declined. The new vintage is inferior to last year in quantity and quality.

On account of the assassination of Count Anvati, the French Consul at Parma received orders to quit his post, unless prompt justice was done. The Piedmontese Gazette brands the crime as execrable, and declares it had produced a feeling of horror through the country.

The national subscription in Italy for the purchase of a million of muskets was proceeding with great success.

The organization of the military forces of the Italian Legation was daily becoming more complete.

General Fanti's head-quarters were at Modena, Garibaldi's at Bologna, and General Mezzacapo's at Rimini.

Volunteers in great numbers had arrived from Venetia, and deserters from the Papal army were flocking in.

A memorandum from the Romagnese government to the European powers had been published. It states all the grievances of the people, shows how the Pope has abdicated his authority, explains the motives which have led to the decree of annexation to Piedmont, and urges the great powers to sanction that arrangement.

The Sardian Minister was on the eve of quitting Rome, and it was expected that before doing so he would place the Sardinian subjects under the protection of the French Embassy.

Nearly all the European powers had despatched vessels of war to be present on the spot during the period of the Spanish expedition to Morocco.

INDIA AND CHINA.

The news is of slight importance. The rebels on the Nepaul frontier were still troublesome. Some of the discharged European troops had already sailed from Calcutta. There are vague reports that Lord Canning had been relieved, and would be succeeded in the Governor Generalship of Lord Clarendon.

The Peibo and Grand Canal were blockaded by British and French war vessels.

Admirable Hope was still in a precarious state.

Ching King Kong, the celebrated rebel leader, was killed by his own people.

The Daily News says there is good reason to believe that the difficulties which were created by the sudden and uncalled-for actions of General Harney at San Juan will be speedily arranged. The language of the United States Government is fair and honourable.

The Times states that the want of funds on the part of the Government of Central Italy is represented as daily becoming more severe, and is doubtless on a break down. It is in this respect that the Emperors of France and Austria mainly calculate on the restoration of the old rulers.

Agents from Tuscany are understood to have been in London and Paris trying to raise one or two millions, but without success.

LIVERPOOL MARKETS, Oct. 21.—At the Corn Exchange, this morning, there was a moderate attendance of buyers. Wheat was purchased to a fair extent at improved prices, making the advance of 2d to 3d per bush. on the week. Flour participated in the movement, and acquired an advancement of 6d to 1s per sack.

Lord Derby's Estates

The Irish Farmers Gazette gives some account of the system of management on Lord Derby's estates in Limerick and Tipperary. The writer first describes the Ballykisteen estate:—

"There are comparatively few specimens of the real old Irish cabin to be found on the estate, and when such do exist it is chiefly on land held under old leases which have not expired, or where they have been permitted to remain until it is convenient to replace them by others. There is a great difference, however, in the way in which these houses as well as farm buildings are kept, both of the oldest houses and yards being cleanly kept; while others, even of a more recent erection, are the reverse.

"Some new laborers cottages have been recently built near Ballykisteen, and it is intended to add to their number. Those which have been erected are double cottages. Each pair of cottages stands on a separate block of land of half an Irish acre—that is, one rood for each cottage—and a little off the road, which leaves room for a garden between the house and the road. Each cottage contains on the ground floor a kitchen 14 feet by 10½ feet, open to the roof and two bed closets, each 9 feet by 6 feet 9 inches. Above the latter is a loft, which forms a third sleeping apartment, access to this being obtained by a moveable trap. Behind the kitchen is a lean-to, which is divided into two parts, a scullery 7 feet by 6 feet 3 inches, and a pantry 7f. by 6 feet 6 inches.

"Before proceeding with my descriptive remarks relative to matters on Lord Derby's estates, it will be as well if we allude first to the system of general management which is followed as an explanation of this will render what we have already said, as well as our after observations, perhaps more easily understood.

"The system adopted on these estates, when a farm is to be let on lease, is that the entire drainage and farm offices, whose such is necessary, is all done by the landlord, and a lease for 21 years is given. All charges for such outlay are included in the rent, which, under such circumstances and on the fine land of which the Ballykisteen estate consists, ranges from £2 to £7 10s. per Irish acre, equivalent to 2s 6d, or 3os. 10½d per estate acre. On other parts of Lord Derby's property the rent is lower, as we shall see, the quality of the land being inferior. When old leases exist, or other circumstances which place the defendant on a different footing, 5 per cent. to be charged on the outlay incurred in such drainage or buildings as may be required. When a farm is held by a tenant from year to year a similar charge is made for all moneys which have been expended by the land lord with the consent of the tenant unless the farm is considered to be let at the full value, and improvements much wanted, when this charge is not made, and the necessary improvements are then made at the expense of the landlord. The tenant from year to year is secured by a stamped agreement just as well as the leaseholder for 21 years, and this yearly agreement becomes, in fact, a lease for life if the tenant is well conducted. By the agreement to which we refer the yearly tenant is entitled to be repaired for all unexhausted manures on a very fair scale, which is set forth in the agreement or any permanent improvements made by him, with consent of the landlord or his representatives, such as fences, &c., whenever his tenancy terminates; and, in fact, the entire aim of the system at work on Lord Derby's estates appears to be—first, to put the tenants in such a position as that they may carry on their operations as farmers without being obliged to expend capital in permanent improvements which might, and in most cases would, cripple them materially in the working of their farms and at the same time to establish such a system of plain and open dealing that not the slightest unfair advantage can be taken of the tenant's industry, while the rights of the landlord are at the same time secured. We need scarcely say that by such a system as this the tenant, whether he be a le

TRIAL FOR MURDER IN PERTH

The Perth Standard says: [illegible] the Assizes came to a conclusion on Saturday last [illegible] evening last.

The criminal cases tried at the Assizes were, William Hughes, for slightly [illegible] ent to jail, and John Kelly, for assault with intent to commit rape. The prisoner, William Hughes, was charged with the murder of his brother-in-law, with whom he had been on bad terms for some time previously. [illegible] principal witness was the prisoner's own sister and the wife of the murdered man.—She was in company with her husband when the prisoner was seen, with a gun in his hand, in the act of climbing over a fence near by. The wife, fearing a collision between the prisoner and her husband, knowing the bad terms on which they were, was on the alert for laying down her shovel, for the purpose of being ready to prevent any such collision, when she heard the report of the gun, but whether fired intentionally by the prisoner, or whether it went off by accident she could not say. The prisoner was defended by F. Powell, Esq., of Ottawa, and the defence set up was that the gun in question was fired by coming in contact with a pitchfork, which, it was tried to make out, was in the hands of the murdered man. Considerable interest was taken in the trial, and the feeling was pretty generally against the prisoner. The jury, however, returned a verdict of "Guilty of Manslaughter," and Hughes was sentenced by His Lordship to seven years' imprisonment in the Provincial Penitentiary.

Kelly, who is a lad about 19 years of age, was found guilty of the crime laid to his charge, "assault with intent to commit rape," and sentenced to two years' confinement in the Upper Canada Juvenile Reformatory.

The Killing of Senator Broderick.

The Portland Argus, a democratic paper, in an article upon the death of Senator Broderick, says that "whatever may have been the worldly provocation, the killing can be justified upon neither moral nor legal principles. In the eye of law and conscience it is murder. A State has thus been deprived of one of its representatives in the senatorial branch of the national Congress, and a man of remarkable energy and perseverance struck down in the prime of life." The New York Post, in an article upon the same subject says:—

"The world could perhaps have better spared a better man. He was yet in middle age; he had outgrown many of the worst influences of his youth; he had four years more to serve in the Senate, where his conduct had been dignified and useful; he was a man of courage, of fidelity, and of sincere conviction; and the great contest between slavery and liberty which is the county, might have rendered inestimable services to the cause of freedom and of justice. We fear that his place will not be supplied by any one so worthy of it; we fear, that some member of the crew by which he was so long hunted, and at length unfriendly, plain, will appear as his successor; and that the vote and influence of the young State of the Pacific will be given, for some years to come, to the side of political corruption and human bondage. Broderick was not an eloquent speaker; he was not an accomplished statesman in the higher sense of that term; but he was not afraid, in any emergency, to say what he thought, or to vote and act with manly independence."

The New York Times comments as follows:—

"In the way frivalous ferocity of combined impetuosity and brutality, it would be difficult to parallel from the records of any people reputed civilized, the details of the recent duel between Senator Broderick and Chief Justice Terry, as related in the telegraphic despatches which we this morning publish in anticipation of the Overland, Mail from California. We commented yesterday upon the public aspects of this most shocking story. Its actual features as they are now made known criticise themselves.

GOOD ADVICE.—Some one says, "the more quietly and peaceably we all get on, the better—the better for ourselves, the better for our neighbors. In wide cabs 'out of ten, the wisest policy is, if a man cheats you, quit dealing with him; if he is abusive, quit his company; if he slanders you, take care to live so that nobody will believe him; no matter who he is, or how he misuses you, the wisest way is generally to let him alone; for there is nothing better than this cool, calm, quiet way of dealing with the wrongs we meet with."

The Virginia Insurrection.

The insurrection at Harper's Ferry, Virginia, startled the public yesterday morning, though sufficiently alarming at the outset, proved to have been a short-lived affair. It was very speedily crushed by the formidable military forces brought against it from Washington, Baltimore and Virginia,—but unhappily, not without serious loss of life.—The parties actively engaged in it seem never to have numbered over fifty or sixty, though ten times that number were before the chief of the affair induced or coerced into an apparent support of the movement.—So far, as appears, it was not the result of any combination among the slaves themselves, but was merely the explosion of a visionary plot concocted by a single man, John Brown, of Kansas notoriety, with the aid of his two sons and one or two other accomplices.

Bruce it will be remembered, suffered severely in the loss of his property and in the death of one of his sons, during the reign of confusion in Kansas. He was a fearless, [illegible] and made him nearly [illegible] Having sworn vengeance against the authors of his calamities, he made himself very conspicuous and outrageously dread- [illegible] by the ruffians during the subsequent troubles in Kansas. He was the leader of a fight at Ossawatomie, where he was said to have killed several of the invading band, driven with his own hand. After the troubles in Kansas had been quieted, Brown's enemy spirit extended its resentment to the Missourians, and especially to the slaveholders, whom he regarded as the authors of his wrongs. He entered into plots for promoting the escape of their slaves, and succeeded in getting twenty or thirty of them away, and in so alarming the slaveholding throughout that section of the State that they forthwith commenced sending their slaves to the Southern States. He himself escaped unharmed and came, it now appears a year ago to the neighborhood of Harper's Ferry, and commenced preparations to renew his operation in Virginia.—It was the very general belief of those who knew him in Kansas that Brown, after the death of his son, became insane upon this subject; and his proceedings certainly gave countenance to the belief. A wilder and more hopeless project than that in which he embarked cannot well be imagined.

There seems to be no reason for believing that the plot had any extensive ramifications, or that any further danger is to be apprehended. Yet the affair can scarcely fail to startle the public mind in Virginia and it may have the same effect as Brown's movements had in Missouri, and increases largely and rapidly the transfer of slaves from Virginia to the more Southern States. Every outbreak, from whatever cause it should spring, quickens the public sense of the insecurity of slave property on the borders of the slaveholding States, and so tends to the removal southward of that frontier.

As a matter of course the violent partisans will seek to make the most of the affair. But we see no reason for supposing that it has any connection whatever with any political movement, or that any party can with justice be held responsible for it. It seems to have been the work of a single man,—asserting under a sense of personal wrong, and insanely seeking to avenge them upon a whole community. How will probably pay the penalty of his rash insanity with his life, and leave, we trust, no inheritors of his passion or his fate.—New York Times.

The Calmucks In China.

A correspondent of the London Times advances a new theory to account for the terrible repulse of the British at the month of the Peiho. He does not believe the story that Russians directed the operations of the Chinese, though a few renegade Europeans may have been among them. His theory is that the men who conducted the operations on the Chinese side were Calmucks, a Caucasian tribe, which in the reign of the Empress Catherine, suddenly emigrated in a body from their native hills into Chinese territory.

This correspondent says that when on a tour in the Caucasus and adjacent provinces in 1838-9, he learned from intelligent Russian officers the facts regarding this emigration—an event without parallel in the history of the world from its first creation with the exception of the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt. The Russians attempted to intercept the flight of the Calmucks; and when, after suffering extraordinary hardships, the emigrants who survived their terrible march had reached the Chinese frontier, they found a powerful Russian force drawn up to bar their further progress. Worn out and exhausted, they yet contrived to force their way, and reached the Mongol territory, the Russian troops followed in hot pursuit. Scarcely, however, had the Russians crossed the boundary, before a murderous fire of musketry and artillery was opened upon them, and they were obliged to retreat.

Thunderstruck at this unexpected repulse, the Russians, having gained their own territory, re-formed on the borders of a lake, but being still completely under the range of the enemy's guns, which played upon them incessantly, a fearful slaughter followed, and the remnant of the Russian force broke and fled in all directions. What most surprised the Russians was, not so much the bravery and discipline of the Calmucks, as their superior train of artillery, and the admirable manner in which it was served.—The murderous precision of the Calmuck gunners utterly paralyzed the Russian soldiers.

The correspondent, who visited China in 1859, says, that he asked some intelligent Chinese why the Calmuck troops were not brought down to fight the British. The reply was to the effect that it would be like inviting the wolf to take care of the sheep. They might easily be brought down, but it might not be so easy getting them back again. But this objection would not apply to a theatre of action so far north as the Peiho, and it is therefore surmised that the British met the Calmucks for the first time in the affair on the Peiho. If the surmise be correct, then may we say to the allies, "Look out, hereafter, for the Calmucks."

WHY ARE NOT IRISH INSURANCE COMPANIES FOUNDED?

This question must often have presented itself to those who knew the amount of money which is annually drained from Ireland to support Scotch and English companies. The Cork Examiner thus ably calls attention to the matter:—"It has long been a matter of regret to persons in this city that so large a sum of money should annually be sent out of the city and out of the country in the shape of fire and life insurance premiums. Ireland contributes an enormous annual tax to feed the insurance offices of England and Scotland. Every company of the sister countries has its representative in almost every one of our principal cities, and in many our chief towns. No matter what the character or stability of the company, it has made its acquaintance with the people through some clever or influential agent.—In this city alone we have exactly seventy insurance agents—the representatives of seventy Scotch and English companies—some of these doing very large business, more of them carrying on what may be considered a fair average business, and many of them doing but little. But on the whole, the amount of business transacted with these English and Scotch companies is literally enormous. Now the idea naturally suggests itself to the mind, whether it be not possible to retain some portion of this enriching stream on our own country, and amongst our own people. That there are difficulties in the way, no one will attempt to deny; but the question is are those difficulties insurmountable? We do not like at present to hazard a decided opinion upon the matter, but we are inclined to take a hopeful view of the probabilities of the case. The Limited Liability Act affords an ample guarantee to shareholders, even of companies which may be regarded as more or less of a speculative character; whereas under the former system ruin might have been, and very often has been, the consequence of meddling in any way with adventures of this kind. But were a man any way so inclined 'I have £50, or £500, which I can spare. I will invest it in such or such an undertaking.' If the Project succeed, so much the better; but if it fail, I cannot under any circumstances lose one penny more than my original investment.'"

THE REVIVAL IN SCOTLAND.

A WHOLE VILLAGE CONVERTED.

Fifteen months since, some friends belonging to a coal pit at Dudshaw, a village near Stanhman, eighteen miles east of Glasgow, wrote to Mr. Abercrombie to come over from America to his native country, and become a teacher of the children belonging to the pitmen. He came; but soon had reason to regret the step; and heartily did he wish and pray that God in his all-wise Providence would open him the way of escape. He had been useful as a teacher, and also as a certified preacher in the States but here he found no congenial spirits, but he was imprisoned in a small hamlet of 300 souls, who seemed to be sunk far below the moral level of his countrymen. The filth of the houses; the degredation of the entire people; the cursing, obscenity, drunkeness, open Sabbath desecration and the incidental poverty and misery were too much for him. He opened a meeting for prayer and preaching; almost no one would attend.—At length, resolved while he was there that he would work, he began to preach outside, and near enough to the houses to be heard by the inmates. Thus he continued preaching, exhorting and praying; and when he was well nigh weary.—about six months ago—he found two or three convincing much concern, who were ultimately led to trust in the Saviour and trust in Him—these with great heartiness helped on the work. Mr. Abercrombie is a Baptist, and as soon as a few, six or seven, gave evidence of a change of heart, he invited Mr. Dunn, Baptist minister of Airdrie, to go over, and they were baptised in the Blae Loch. At this ordinance, at which there were many witnesses, great solemnity pervailed—many were pricked in their hearts, and were shortly afterwards a goodly number desired to confess Christ, and were also baptised into His name. Last Saturday, August 13th, twenty-three were added to the number—in all about sixty souls, out of an adult population of about 100. The afternoon was stormy, with wind and rain; but the great interest felt on the occasion brought about 300 people together at the Loch, which is miles away from any town—some from Stanhman, Falkirk, Glasgow, &c. The candidates were arranged in order, 11 females and 12 males, (all the previous baptisms had been males), and the whole assembly joined in singing

"We're going, going on our journey home,
We're travelling to the city in the skies."

Prayer was then offered, and a short address embracing the Gospel and the Primitive Christian Baptism.

As the converts came "up out of the water" ever and anon a verse of some cheerful hymn was sung; such as,

"I love Jesus, He's my Saviour,
I love Jesus, yes I do,"

Or

"Oh how He loves."

Or

"Oh come let us sing,
To the God of Salvation!"

And the good pastor with an affection which must have been witnessed to be fully appreciated, would welcome them with "Come along, my good brother!" "I bless the Lord, sister!" and another and another embracing the hand with a grip that only a woman could give, would say "Bless the Lord, Robert; thank the Lord!"

Thus the whole character of the village has been changed, radically and completely. No whiskey is drunk in it, the houses are clean and comfortable, a prayer meeting goes from house to house every evening; and there only eight houses without a convert. Seven are still asking for baptism,—they pray and sing with a fervour, a solemnity and a delight that is truly wonderful to behold, and the good pastor now recognises God's providence, and is very thankful for being led to this sphere of usefulness and that his labors have been so eminently and signally blessed. I cannot conclude this brief sketch without acknowledging the zeal and ever willing services of the Rev. Mr. Dunn, of Airdrie, who has always been most willing to assist in the good work at whatever sacrifice and convenience to himself. For fully half an hour did he stand with a christian brother of the village in the water on Saturday; but they were amply repaid—for the scene was most elevating, as the melodious ring of the voices ascended upwards, and the glorious sun shone from the clear blue sky—for heaven seemed visibly to smile upon the happy scene.—Ayrshire Express.

THE SHOE TRADE.

The staple trade of Stafford continues remarkably brisk; orders are numerous.—The demand, in fact, for nearly all kinds of boots and shoes is greater than the supply. The consumption is that both makers and binders have full employment, and the former are eagerly engaged by the manufacturers, who are paying the advance of wages on machine-sewed uppers as arranged. The sewing machines are busily engaged in work in nearly every manufactory in the town, and the improved appearance of the females who are engaged there is the constant theme of all classes. Hitherto scores of young women devoted their time from early morn till after sundown in binding boot tops at home, and the result was, an untidy unwealthy home, slatternly attire, a sickly countenance, and an impaired constitution; but now that their habits are regular, they return to a cleanly hearth, are respectably clothed, and the hue of health resting on the cheek, gives indication of health vigor, and happiness. Never perhaps has a strike of the protracted character which signalized the one in Stafford resulted in so much real benefit (although at first against their will) to the citizens of a town, and, notwithstanding the fears at one time expressed, that the trade would be driven away to other places, there can be little doubt, from the increase of business, that the manufacturers will reap the full advantage to which their adoption of machinery justly entitles them.—Wolverhampton Post.

THE RAMSAY LEAD MINES.

From a Correspondent of the Kingston News.

I have seen the best lead mines in Cornwall, Northumberland, and Durham, but I never saw one so rich at grass as that now opening at Ramsay. In England we think ourselves well off, if, after years of labor and sinking through a hundred fathoms of rock we can strike a lode containing half the ore which here protrudes itself at the surface. And with such a property in their hands, I am surprised that the owners do not push their work with more energy. The engine shaft is not down more than ten fathoms, and is half full of water; the engine being a mere toy, eight or ten horse power, utterly unfit for pumping; and much better than a horse-whim for hoisting the water in bark. In the slopes above the water level, a few men were working on the back of the lode, and taking out as fine ore as ever was seen in Cornwall, [illegible] Calcined lead [illegible] things [illegible]

[illegible] wealth in depth. The gangue is a friable calc-spar, [illegible] shining galy, white [illegible] plate, and requiring little powder; the lode itself, though disordered in places, being a powerful [illegible] of the mesh [illegible] character, and carrying on its back the finest Galena I ever saw my eyes on. In England that Galena alone would call a meeting, thousands of pounds, if not superfluous, of its costly be found within a hundred fathoms of it, for it is a sign of an abundance of mineral which never fails.

The agent assured me that forty tons of pig-lead had been melted this year from the product of the surface workings, and I estimate there will be as much more in the pile of ore ready for the crusher. The crusher by the way, is a novelty, and the best one in that line I have ever seen. The ordinary ore-crusher is a series of ponderous iron rollers revolving in pairs near each other, and requiring a powerful engine to drive them. The Ramsay Crusher consists of two strong cast iron mills, geared so as to be run together or separate, the one made a good deal like a Burr Mill, a hollow cylinder in which a toothed cone revolves for breaking the raw ore into pieces the size of a chestnut, and a kind of exaggerated Coffee Mill which grinds these to powder. The little engine drives these easily, and the way they do their work is something to admire. That crusher would be worth a Jew's eye in Cornwall, and is worth a trip across the Atlantic to see. If everything else was in keeping the Ramsay Mine would go ahead.

IRISH LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

The condition of Irish asylums presents a more than satisfactory picture compared with kindred institutions in England and Scotland. The total number of lunatics in the sixteen district asylums on the 31st March amounted to 4,090—viz., 2,087 males and 2,003 females, of whom only 1,275 were considered curable. The lunatics in workhouses numbered 2,047, of whom 1,090 were certified as requiring removal to district asylums. In gaols the number lemaining at the same date would appear to be 223. The number of lunatics at the Dundrum Asylum was 130; in private asylums, 477; at Lucan Spa House and elsewhere, 102—making altogether 6,959 under official supervision, against 6,515 on the same date in 1857. The total cost of maintenance of the lunatics in asylums amounted during the year to £81,080, averaging £19 19s 9½d. per head, and little over three-half-pence in the pound on the rateable valuation of the country. This does not include the repayments on account of funds advanced by the Treasury for erection of asylums, the unliquidate portion of which at present is set down at £28,000, inavaible in semi-annual instalments. The expenditure per head per annum in English asylums average £25, which is about the same as the Irish gaoler, so that the inspectors may well congratulate the ratepayers, who contribute to the support of district asylums, on the economy which characterises their management. The return of discharges and deaths exhibited the gratifying fact that of the 2,601 cases admitted to asylums during the last two years, 1,267, or 48.71 per cent. were discharged cured, against 36.99 per cent. in the Scotch, and 38.49 in English asylums. The deaths during the same period numbered only 534, making 7.32 per cent. on the average number under treatment, the corresponding proportions being 8.37 for Scotland and 10.30 for England. Of the deaths, too, those from suicide, accident, or violence, were remarkably few, an observation which does not hold good in regard to the institutions of our beautiful neighbors; and the inspectors dwell with just pride on the fact that cases of cruelty or abuse are rarely or never heard in this country.—Evening Post.

Valuable Property

FOR SALE,

On Liberal Terms of Credit,

BY

PUBLIC AUCTION.

WILL be sold on the premises, in the Town of Peterborough, on Wednesday, 2nd Nov., 1859,

at the hour of Two o'clock in the afternoon.—By virtue of a Power of Sale in that behalf, contained in a certain Indenture of Mortgage, dated the Fourth day of November, A. D. 1857, and made by John Glen of the Town of Peterborough, in the County of Peterborough, Merchant, of the first part, and Harriet Glen, his wife, of the second part, and George Cooper and William Ogilvy of the said Town of Peterborough, Merchants, of the third part; All and singular those certain parcels or tracts of land and premises, being Town Lots, Numbers Three and Four, south of Sherbrooke Street and West of George Street, in the Town of Peterborough; together with all the houses, buildings and erections thereon, and all appurtenances thereunto belonging.

The above property is situated in the flourishing town of Peterborough, and is within five hundred yards of the Port Hope and Peterboro' Railway Depot, with which a connection could be made at a trifling cost. There is a large and substantial building on the property, which was built and fitted up for distilling purposes, but never having been used, could be turned into Flour Mills or any kind of Manufactory at a comparatively trifling expense. It is particularly adapted to either Distilling or brewing purposes on a large scale, as it contains all the Tubs, Shafting, Copperworks and Machinery necessary for that business, constructed on the most approved principles. A considerable stream running through the premises furnishes a never failing supply of water, and night standby be added in conjunction with steam as a motive power.—There is a new Engine and Boiler in the building which cost $2000. These are of the most approved make, are very powerful, and have never been used. The Out-houses are well built, and are capable of Stabling two Hundred head of Cattle. Altogether the property will be found one of the most desirable investments for Capitalists, Manufacturers or others to be met with.

TERMS OF SALE,

One fourth down, and the remainder in equal payments, at ONE, TWO AND THREE years. For further particulars apply to

$100 A YEAR,

AND upwards saved to the Farmers, by ALDUS MOWRY'S

CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 18 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

THE CHOP GRINDER

All orders directed to "M. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.

The inventor, Aldus Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.

Address, "Aldus Mowry, Peterboro', C. W."

N. B.—Any persons infringing upon this Patent, will be prosecuted to the utmost extent the law will allow. Patent dated March 16th, 1859.

PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE
BETTER THAN
EXPERIMENTAL SCIENCE.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE SUFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilized alike, has proved that simple eruptions, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developments of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of inflammation and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and permanently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and using as a dressing, this inestimable Ointment.

Scrofula, Erysipelas, and Salt RHEUM.

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysipelas, can long withstand its influence.

Bad Legs, Old sores, and Ulcers

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Eruptions of the Skin.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic disease, are eradicated, and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Piles and Fistula.

Every form and feature of these provincial and stubborn disorders is conducted hereby and entirely by the use of this emollient; wounds from accidents should precede his application. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Breasts,
Fistula,	Sore Heads,
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all Kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Sprains,
Piles,	Stiff Joints,
Rheumatism,	Tetter,
Ringworm,	Ulcers,
Salt Rheum,	Venereal Sores,
Scalds,	Wounds of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London" are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaves of directions, which may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

☞ Sold at the Establishment of Professor Holloway, 244 Strand, (near Temple Bar), and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the civilized world, in pots at 1s 1½d, 2s 9d, 4s 6d, 11s, 22s, and 33s each.

☞ There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are affixed to each pot.

Selected Poetry.

The Infidel and his Daughter.

Suggested by reading a recent paragraph describing the scene between the brave old Ethan Allen and his daughter, on the eve of her death, when she asked the stern infidel in whose faith he would have her to die—his or her mother's:

"The damps of dew are coming fast,
My father o'er my brow;
The past with all its scenes has fled
And I must turn me now
To that dim future, which in vain
My eyes seek to descry:
Tell me, my father, in this hour,
In whose belief I die.

"In thine? I've watched thy scornful smile,
And heard thy withering tone,
When'er the Christian's humble hope
Was placed above thine own.
I've heard thee speak of coming death
Without a shade of gloom,
And laugh at all the childish fears
That cluster round the tomb.

"Or is it in my mother's faith?
How fondly do I trace
Through many a weary year long past
That calm and saintly face!
How often do I call to mind,
Now she's beneath the sod,
The place, the hour, in which she drew
My early thoughts to God!

'Twas then she took this sacred book,
And from its burning page
Read how its truths support the soul
In youth and failing age;
And bade me in its precepts live,
And by its precepts die,
That I might share a home of love
In worlds beyond the sky.

"My father, shall I look above
Amid this gathering gloom,
To Him, whose promises of love
Extend beyond the tomb?
Or curse the Being who hath blessed
This chequered path of mine?
Must I embrace my mother's faith
Or die, my sire, in thine?'

The frown upon that warrior's brow
Passed like a cloud away,
And tears flowed down that rugged cheek
Ne'r wet until that day.
"Not, not in mine!" with choking voice
The skeptic made reply;
"But in thy mother's holy faith,
My daughter may'st thou die!"

Christians and Infidels.

Christians believe that the Bible was given by Divine inspiration, and that Christianity is a revelation from God. Infidels deny Divine inspiration, and reject Christianity. It is therefore well worth our while to inquire which possesses the greatest advantages to arrive at truth in this matter, Christians or infidels, and who are best qualified to judge? In order to investigate a matter of this character and arrive at a satisfactory conclusion, it requires both intellectual and moral qualifications. Let us therefore briefly inquire.

1st. What has been the amount of intellectual qualifications possessed by many of the most eminent adherents and advocates of Christianity for investigating its truth or falsehood. Will any one deny that among its advocates there have been and now are, multitudes of men in the highest degree qualified to decide on any question of evidence that may be submitted to them? Will any man pretend that imbecility of intellect, or want of general knowledge of science and literature, produced the belief in Christianity of such men as Sir Isaac Newton, John Locke, Sir Matthew Hale, Hon. Robert Boyle, Bishop Butler, John Wesley, Dr Watts, Adam Clarke, Mr. Wilberforce, Dr. Paley, Dr. Beattie, Dr. Chalmers, and Robert Hall? [illegible] too well known to be denied that, in strength of intellect, extent of knowledge of men and things, these men have had no superiors in the republic of letters, and no equals in the ranks of infidelity.—They have furnished a demonstration that the most sublime exercise of reason is not incompatible with the profound respect for Christianity. Had Christianity been defective in the evidences of its divine authority, these men surely had sufficient capacity to have discovered this fact. But in discussing such a question as Christianity presents there needs to be moral as well as intellectual qualifications to enable men to judge correctly. Inquirers after the truth must be candid, and they must be patient in their investigations. They must not be blinded by worldly interests or their sordid passions. They must desire to know the truth, and be prepared to love it for its own sake. Let us therefore inquire,

2nd. What has been the amount of moral qualifications possessed by the advocates of Christianity to enable them to decide upon its claims? What were the characters of the men to whom illusion has been made? And what has been the general character of its most eminent advocates? Have they been those whose proscriptions have been blasted and vetoed by an irregular and profligate life, or has it been otherwise?—And what has been the moral character of most of the champions and advocates of infidelity? If two persons of equal intellect, one of them humble, pious and benevolent, and the other proud, self-important, and devoted to pleasure, should be led to universe to ascertain the truth or falsehood of Christianity, which of them would be selected to be most competent and to be the most correct? Which of them would possess the most correct moral feelings, principles, and habits would possess the greatest advantage. A wrong state of mind would greatly influence the decisions of the ablest standing in relation to moral truth. It is most unusual for wicked men to search and endeavor to vilify a religion which utterly condemns their conduct and denounces them as the objects of the Divine displeasure.

It is a fact which cannot be denied that the moral character of almost all the opposition and persecution of infidelity has been extremely [illegible]. What were Herbert, Hobbes, Shaftesbury, Wollaston, Tindal, and Bolingbroke? [illegible] many hypocrites, who professed to [illegible] reverence Christianity, while they were in the same time [illegible] with impiety to [illegible] In addition to the [illegible] Hume, Voltaire, and Rousseau, is too well known, were no honour to human nature in their moral aspect. And to mention no more, what was the moral character of Thomas Paine, author of "The Age of Reason," when he made his attack on the Bible, but a notorious, vile, lascivious drunkard?

If, then, the intellectual advantages of the advocates of Christianity are, to say the least, fully equal to those infidels who have disbelieved it and if their moral qualifications have been far superior, to what conclusion must such a fact conduct us?—Will it not be that the Christian is much more likely to be right in embracing Christianity than the infidel is in rejecting it?

In a subsequent number I shall make it appear that the moral effects which Christianity produces on society are altogether preferable to the effects of infidelity, a fact which speaks volumes in favor of Christianity, and which should awaken suspicions in every mind against infidelity in all its various forms, whether in its more ancient or modern dress.—Christian Advocate and Journal.

Confessions of Infidelity.

"I scorn," says Hume, "affrightened and confounded with the solitude in which I am placed by my philosophy. When I look abroad, on every side I still dispute, contradiction and distraction. When I turn my eye inward, I find nothing but doubt and ignorance. Where am I? or what am I? To what condition shall I return? I am confounded with questions. I begin to fancy myself in a most deplorable condition, environed with darkness on every side."

Voltaire says: "The world abounds with wonders, and also with victims. In man is more wretchedness than in all other animals put together."

How did he judge of it? By his own heart. He adds:

"Man loves life, yet he knows he must die; spends his existence in diffusing the miseries he has suffered—cutting the throats of his fellow-creatures for pay—cheating and being cheated. The bulk of mankind, he continues, "are nothing more than a crowd of wretches, equally criminal, equally unfortunate. I wish I had never been born."

Hear what St. Paul says: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord the righteous Judge, will give me at that day."—Lutheran Observer.

Suicide of a Hampeched Husband.

An English paper contains the following story of a husband driven to commit suicide by his wife:

An inquest was held at Cambridge, on Saturday last, on the body of Henry John Masters, who had committed suicide by hanging. He left a letter addressed to his wife, in which he says:—

'You will get married again; I pity the unfortunate man that ever comes under your roof; he might as well be a toad under a harrow; there is some difference between the smiles in the shop and the frowns in the room; you cannot when alone give a kind answer. Oh, the deceit no one could believe. I always was cheerful before strangers, as I did not wish to let every one know what a fool I had made of myself; I can safely say the face had worn the smile when the heart bleeded, and many have said he has jumped into a good home; I can safely say that I jumped out of one.—You know I was unhappy, why did you not try to soothe me? No, you were the more aggravating. My God! my God! I thank you, that you left me nerve enough to write these few lines. When the wind blows and the snow falls, meditate upon these few lines and say, "God forgive his sins, and take him to that heavenly rest where there is all joy and happiness." Keep this, and look at it well, and you know all in the truth, so help me God. My time is getting short now, so I write no more. I go and pray to my heavenly Father to forgive my sins and those connected with me. No more on earth from your loving and unhappy husband."

The jury returned the following verdict: "That the deceased destroyed himself while in a fit of temporary insanity, brought on by the bad conduct of his wife and they thought she ought to be brought before the jury and severely censured by the coroner."—The coroner thought it would be better that the censure should be conveyed to the wife in writing by him, and the jury concurred.

Pay Your Debts.

If a man has got money, therefore, the first thing he is to do with it is to pay his debts—to owe no man anything. This is common sense and right religion. If a man tries to play the prince, and give away money, while he cannot pay his debts, he defrauds being a generous man, he is not even an honest one. We would state this continually not to encourage the excuse which others often urge for not giving to charity —namely that they are in debt—for almost any man who is in business has debts—at the same time, he may have ample means to pay all his debts. If a man owes [illegible] dollars, that is no reason why he [illegible] a cent of charity, if he has got [illegible] hundred thousand to pay it with. But [illegible] man is utterly bankrupt, he has no right to give away the money, which properly belongs to others. The money is not his own. He is taking [illegible] the farmer, and the [illegible], and the [illegible], to bestow it upon [illegible] object, and thus obtain the praise of [illegible] while he does not keep his word. On this [illegible] some good men [illegible] giving [illegible] of conscience. They [illegible] they [illegible] to please. They [illegible] with their services, and so [illegible] receives a [illegible] which [illegible] to the [illegible] who [illegible] and the Duke of Wellington? And Hogarth [illegible] and Hume, Voltaire, and Rousseau, is too well known, were no honour to human nature in their moral aspect. And to mention no more, what was the moral character of Thomas Paine, author of "The Age of Reason," when he made his attack on the Bible, but a notorious, vile, lascivious drunkard?

Who wrote the Pilgrims Progress?

From the Belfast Northern Whig.

In this age of wonderful discovery and of historical doubts on all manner of subjects—when we are requested that Richard III. did not murder the Princes in the Tower, and did not carry a hump on his back, as the vulgar have, for nearly four hundred years past, supposed; but, on the contrary was an especially handsome gentleman—when we are taught that Henry VIII. was not at all a person "who spared no time in his anger and no woman in his lust," as people still believe, but a person of a most delicate and sensitive, [illegible] and moral conscience, sensible, gentle beautiful, and chaste in the extreme; when we have also arrived at the discovery that many of the greatest beauties in what we in our delusion call Shakespere's plays, were never written by the author of those plays, but are the creation of the blunderings of compositors, and the carelessness of proof-readers in printing-offices; and are further assured that not one of the plays called Shakespeare, but are all the work of Lord Bacon; even in this age of wonderful discovery, we are confounded at just learning that the tinker, John Bunyan, never wrote the "Pilgrim's Progress" at all; but, being an illiterate mender of pots and pans, and a fellow who took care when he patched up one hole in a kettle to knock out another in its stead, stole the whole concern bodily from a French writer of the fifteenth century, of the name of Guillaume de Guileville and like Mr. Disraeli, when he stole from Macauley, did not put himself to the trouble of disguising or disfiguring the stolen article, so as to avoid the detection and conviction which have now come upon him.

In the private correspondence of the Freeman's Journal it is announced that "an interesting literary discovery has just been brought to light:

It was asserted that some time ago that Bunyan who wrote the 'Pilgrim's Progress' was an impostor, and that the whole story was made up from an ancient manuscript. Several erudite members of the Reformed Church wrote letters to the newspapers, denouncing the libel, and claiming for honest John Bunyan the whole credit of having conceived and written the famous 'Progress.' Miss Catherine Isabella Cust, has however, taken up the gauntlet thrown down by Dr. Cumming and other admirers of Mr. Bunyan, and has shown, beyond all possibility of doubt, and on the most irrefragable evidence, that Bunyan, the "Star of Protestantism," was a mere duffer, and a shabby, unprincipled duffer into the bargain. She has published (this day) a translation from the French manuscript copy in the British Museum of the 'Pylegremage of the Sowle,' by Guillaume de Guileville, a churchman who flourished in the fifteenth centuary. The original work was translated in England seventy years before the Reformation, and was printed by Caxton in 1483. Bunyan's 'Pilgrims Progress' is nearly a verbatim copy of this rare work, with a few alterations here and there, to give it the tinge of originality!",

Now, think of such a thing as the half illiterate tinker of Bedford prowling about in dusty libraries, amongst neglected French manuscripts, for the purpose of such literary impostures as only persons who, like Mr. Disraeli, have got some amount of a literary education, are capable of committing. If ignorance leads many to crime, there are some crimes from the commission of which men are certainly saved by their ignorance. The honest rustic, as he gazed at the criminal in the pillory, upon whose breast an inscription which she could not read was placed, declaring that he stood there for the crime of forgery, thankfully remarked—"Ay, all that comes of your reading and writing." Think only of the Bedford tinker lightning, in some vessel's library, on a work printed by Caxton in 1483; and taking hold of this rare work, and like an accomplished literary swindler, making "a few alterations here and there, to give it the tinge of originality!" We might conceive that, in his time, John Bunyan was capable of giving the tinge of originality to a supernumerated pot or pan, by putting a new bottom to it, or furnishing it with a brilliant lid; but we must tell that lady—wherever she be—who rejoices in the name of Miss Catherine Isabella Cust, that tinkers have done scarcely anything in this world in the way of literary imposture.—They have left the offence to people of gentealer pretensions; and this story of Catherine Isabella Cust's is about as rank and as simple an attempt at literary imposture as either man or woman was ever guilty of in this world. Imagine only the obscurdity of telling us that the book of the Calvinist tinker, in the seventeenth centuary is wholly stolen from the work a clergyman of the Arminian Church of Rome in the fifteenth.

RIDICULE.

If there is a destroyer of good feeling, friendship, affection and love; if there is one thing more than another that will change love to hatred, convert the heart and poison it in stillness. We can most easily compass and lead away from right and duty by ridicule; to avoid the shame we compromise with our consciences, commit the grossest wrong, and in an hour how to fly that with burning bitterness of spirit; oh, how deep our contrition.

The last breath of the desert simoon is not more deathly than the voice of ridicule. We are afraid of it, we tremble ourselves, and cower in the dust at its command; we degrade ourselves to avoid it. It arouses the most fiendish passions; the eye flashes, the human tongue simultaneously over the fiery fire, that rages within it; the heart beats, pulse, and all control is gone.

DEATH! life is too precious; Love is [illegible] Friendship is [illegible] Happiness [illegible] with happiness to be destroyed [illegible] thus thoughtlessly. Rather let every word every thought, be weighed in the balances of your heart, stripped of every vanity adorning and [illegible] and then go forth to fulfil gently, smoothly, like spring-time rain drops, on the care of your fellow-mortals.

The preacher tells us that "laughter is mad," and the proverb of the wise man adds a warning that "the end of mirth is heaviness." There was a deep moral in the Athenian law which interdicted a judge of the Areopagus from writing a comedy.—The habit of looking at the ludicrous side of life is always hurtful to the moral feeling. The pleasure is fainting and vanishing, and leaves behind it an apprehension of [illegible]. Raffaelle and Hogarth, "Cooper" and the "Tale of a Tub," are not premiums by a broad gulf. "It is not good to live in jest since we must die in earnest."

No other element of literature is so susceptible and violate as wit. It comes in and goes out with the moon; when most flourishing it has its boundaries, from which as Swift said, it may not wander, upon peril of being lost. This geographical chain has bound, with heavier or slighter links, the pleasantry of Lucian, the buffoonery of Rabelais, the pictures of Dryden, and the caricatures of Butler.

Laughter, "holding both his sides," is after all greatly preferable to

"Loathed melancholy,
Of Cerberus, and blackest midnight born."

THE IMMENSITY OF THE UNIVERSE.

The space in which the system composing the universe moves is illimitable. Were we to attempt to assign its limits, what could we imagine to be beyond? The number of worlds is infinitely great; it is inexpressible indeed, by numbers. A ray of light travels 180,000 miles in a second of time. A year comprises millions of seconds, yet there are fixed stars so immeasurably distant, that their light would require billions of years to reach our eyes. We are acquainted with animals possessing teeth, and organs of motion and digestion, which are wholly invisable to the naked eye. [illegible] Other animals exist, which if measurable, would be found many thousands of times smaller, which nevertheless possess the same apparatus.—These creatures, in the same manner as the larger animals, take nourishment, and are propagated by means of ova, which must, consequently, be again many hundreds of times smaller than their own bodies. It is only because our organs of vision is imperfect, that we do not perceive creatures million times smaller than these. What variety and what infinite gradations do the constituents of our globe present to us in their properties and their conditions! There are bodies which are twenty times heavier than an equal volume of water; there are others which are ten thousand times lighter, the ultime particles of which cannot be known by the most powerful microscopes. Finally we have starlight—that wonderful messenger that brings us daily intelligence of the continued existance of numberless worlds, the expression of an immaterial essence which no longer obeys the laws of gravitation, and yet manifests itself to our senses by innumerable effects. Even the light of the sun—with the arrival of which upon the earth inanimate nature receives life and motion—we cleave asunder into rays, which, without any power of illumination, produce the most important alterations and decompositions in organic nature. We separate from light certain rays, which exhibit among themselves a diversity as great as exists among colours. But nowhere do we we observe either a beginning or an end.—Liebig's Letters on Chemistry. (Second Series.)

A WONDERFUL DOG.

On Sabbath last, two local preachers, belonging to the Primitive Methodists at South Shields, went to preach at Usworth, a colliery village some eight or nine miles off. They finished the labors of the day a little after 8 o'clock, and soon after set their faces homeward. The evening had passed and night, robed in her starry ofttimes had approached, giving the two preachers an opportunity of conversing on the sublimities of the stellar regions. The had not proceeded far in their interesting conversation when they were overtaken by a large Newfoundland dog, and some time elapsed before they took any particular notice of the animal. They pursued their way and still the dog followed, when they thought it necessary to drive him back, as he appeared to be a valuable animal, and his owner might come to seek him should he stray away from home. Notwithstanding all the means employed, the dog followed, keeping the two preachers ahead at a respectable distance. They continued on their way, and came through some fields which led to the main road. When coming through one of these fields, the dog passed them, making a whining noise as he came by, which, by their interpretation, sounded like a mark of disapprobation at their driving him back.—Before they came to the hedge at the bottom of the field, they heard the dog growling and barking, and upon advancing a few steps further, they were terror stricken at beholding three men in the hedge ready to pounce upon them. Two leaped back in the hedge, and the other shot down, as the dog snarled and the two preachers passed by. The preachers went on quickly, leaving the dog in front of the rascals. After they had got about a mile further the dog came up to them again, and appeared pleased, as if he had fetched his master. They determined that he should follow, and that when they separated, the one he followed should take him home, give him a supper and a night's lodging, and take him back the next day. They went on and down the railway, and as soon as they turned off the line to pass into a lane leading into the town, the dog turned round and took his departure home, leaving the two preachers in safety, and thankful for his kind especially and protection.—Newcastle Daily Chronicle.

Odds and Ends.

Among articles daily advertised are 'unbeggary children's chairs." The father of the wonderful family must have been one of the "Weeds."

How should a miller address his lady-love? In the language of flours, to be sure.

If asked what physician stood at the top of his profession, we should say it was the gentleman who was in the habit of attending "patients on the monument."

"Mr. Brush, you say you know the defendant—what is his character?" "For what, sir, speaking or integrity?" "For integrity, sir." "Well, all I can say about Jones is, that if he's honest, he's got a queer way of showing it, that's all!"

"My dear madam," said a doctor to his patient, "I am truly gratified to see you yet in life. At my last visit yesterday, you know that I told you you had but sixteen hours to live." "Yes, doctor, you did; but I did not take the doses you left me."

There is a place in New Hampshire where they never have any old maids.—When the girl reaches the age of twenty-nine, and is still on the ladder of expectation, the young fellows club together and draw lots for her. Those who escape pay a bonus to the one who gets her.

An Irishwoman called upon an apothecary with a sick infant; he gave her a powder, of which she was to give the child as much as she could put on a sixpence.—The woman said, "Perhaps yer honor will find me the sixpence, for I haven't one at all, at all."

It is easier to find a thousand reasons why man should differ in opinion than one why they fight about it.

Genius and gold are in one respect alike. Many persons are constantly writing about both who have neither.

Canadian Nationality.

Whoever looks attentively at the geographical position of Canada, and studies her vast resources, must see that she has a great destiny before her. What greater natural advantages could be desired by a Canadian for his country? Commanding with the great lakes at the far west, and following along the majestic St. Lawrence with its navigable gulf to the Ocean, making about thirteen hundred miles: then journeying from south to north a distance varying from two to three hundred miles, what a territory as presented to the observer! Not only is the soil generally fertile and most of the country habitable, but the greatest variety is furnished, and the utmost beauty of landscape. The surface is gently undulating, and beautiful lakes, rivers and valuable forests have greatly enriched as well as beautified it. In fact, Canada is adapted to all the purposes of an agricultural, manufacturing and commercial people. No future statesman needs be at a loss to discover materials to promote the growth of the country. Canada is endless in resources.

But with all these advantages, there is little real national feeling in Canada. The main reason is obvious. Our inhabitants are generally from other countries, or the first generation of those who were and they cannot forget the land of their birth, or cease to be influenced by those traditional reflections which are peculiar to all older nations. These prejudices and peculiarities have been fostered by the constitution of national societies in our midst. These societies preserve the costume and habits, and perpetuate the peculiarities of their respective nations. And as the number of nationalities in the Province is great, these different associations seem to vie with each other in their display, and in respect for the "father land." All this is natural enough It would be unpatriotic, and consequently inhuman, to be unmindful of the land of our birth. We cannot condemn the practice of periodically celebrating, in foreign lands, and in adopted countries, the historical and personal recollection of one's native country. But should this feeling predominate to the sacrifice of an active regard for the land of our adoption?

We address all classes. We have now a population of about three millions of naturalized adopted citizens, and our country is constantly increasing her population. Is it not the duty of all classes to cherish a feeling of Canadian nationality? To look upon themselves as the common inhabitants of a distant country? And, if need be, to secure the prevalence of this sentiment, we would recommend even a gradual severance of the cords which bind us to the land of our fathers. Let Canadian associations be formed. Let Canadians teach their children to revere this great country and her institutions and laws. Let all distinctions of birth be overlooked, and all who have taken up their residence here be regarded as part of this flourishing people.

In this recommendation we have not forgotten our position as colonists. We are not arguing for independence, much less would we desire amalgamation with the neighboring republic. In fact, to our condition as a colony we ascribe our unparelled prosperity. We have enjoyed the advantages of British protection, we have been assisted by British capital and we have been animated as a people with the spirit of British liberty. A change to independence, under the most favorable auspices, at present, would not materially improve our condition, and it might prove our ruin. The time will doubtless arrive in the course of national events, when Canada will cease to be a colony; but what circumstances, it is not ours to speculate, nor do we regards such as other than remote.—Brockville Recorder.

Geographical Discoveries by Dr Livingstone.

A letter from Dr. Livingstone to Sir George Grey is just published, dated from Rivor Shire, June 1. It contains a sketch of some important geographical discoveries. The enterprising missionary traveller says:

We have lately discovered a very fine lake by going up this river in the steam launch about a hundred miles, and then marching some fifty more on foot. It is moreover, particularly interesting from the fact reported by the natives on its shores that it is separated by a strip of land of only five or six miles in width from Nyanja or Lake N'yassi—the Stars—which Burton has gone to explore. We could hear nothing of his party at Shirwa. Lake Shirwa has no outlet, and its waters are bitter but drinkable. It abounds in fishes, leeches, alligators, and hippopotami. We discovered also, by examining partially a branch of the Shire called Rue, that one portion of Shirwa is not more than thirty miles distant from a point that may easily be reached by the launch, which by newspaper measurement draws thirteen inches, and actually thirty-one inches. The Lake Shirwa is very grand; it is surrounded on all sides by lofty green mountains. Droho—or, as people nearest it say, "Zomba"—is over 6,000 feet high, of the same shape as Table Mountain, but inhabited on the top. Others are equally high but unassailable. It is a high land region, the lake itself being 2,900 feet above the sea; it is twenty or thirty miles wide and fifty or sixty long. On going some way up a hill, we saw in the far distance two mountain tops, rising like little islands on a watery horizon. An inhabited mountain island stands near where we first came to it. From the size of the waves, it is supposed to be deep. Dr. Kirk and I with Moses Mabalale formed the head-party. The country is well peopled, and very much like London in the middle of the country, many streams rising out of bogs; the vegetation entirely tropical also. Never saw so much cotton grown as among the Manganja of the Shire and Shirwa Valleys—all spun and woven it. These are the latitudes which I have always pointed out as the cotton and sugar lands; they are pre-eminently so; but such is the disinterestedness of some people that labor is objected to. Bourbon instead of being manured here. The only blots the people have is that of slaves and the debt. Emancipated we make them free, a study of British style of trading; but they thanked their deportment testimony to British that we were Christians, and all Portuguese. There are no Missions of the Free Church; they are all over of the Shire, at least this can scarcely be called "Lone Mercy." The Portuguese know nothing of it."

TRADE AND WAGES IN IRELAND.

For many a year there has not been as much activity in certain branches connected with the building trade as at the present moment. In Dublin, master printers and decorators, &c., find it impossible to procure sufficient aid for the work in hand, and wages in their branches materially are increased. A painter of my acquaintance will get £1 10s per week. While plasterers formerly in receipt of 30s per week, will now have their pay raised to 35s. Bricklayers' wages have also been increased, and the demand for masons is unprecedented. Carpenters are in request, and the rate of wages has been raised. Plumbers are also in demand, and their wages have been increased. Slaters are in request, and their wages have been increased. Plasterers' laborers are in request, and their wages have been increased. Bricklayers' laborers are in request, and their wages have been increased. Hodmen are in request, and their wages have been increased. Slaters' laborers are in request, and their wages have been increased. News from British Columbia.

Our dates from Victoria, V. I., are to September 27.

A weekly journal, the first in British Columbia, has just appeared, entitled the New Westminster Times. It is pretty large and handsomely printed. It is strongly pro-British, and supports the administration of Gov. Douglas.

The Legislative Assembly of Vancouver's Island is about being dissolved. George Hunter Carey, Attorney General for British Columbia, and George John Wright barrister are already out with their addresses to the "Gentleman voters" and "Free and Independant electors of Victoria," and amongst others named as coming in good time, are Messrs. Helmcken Yates and McCay of the present House, and Selim Franklin, auctioneer; Alfred Waddington, proprietor of Waddington-street; C. B. Young Merchant; J. T. Pidwell, street contractor; A. DeCosmos, editor; D. Babington Rug Esq., barrister, and a number of others.

The coloured gentlemen of Victoria—that is, those who are subjects of Her Majesty, and possessed of the requisite property qualifications as voters—have also nominated one of their number, Nathan Pointer, Esq., who keeps the shirt and gentleman's furnishing depot on Yates-street, to represent their interest and stand for the Assembly in the coming scrub race.

It is said that the voters of this class (the coloured people) comprise forty-five of the one hundred citizens entitled to vote in Victoria district, so that if they will but unite upon a candidate and cast their votes for him on the day of election, of a surety he will be elected to the House of Assembly Vancouver's Island. It is said that in the event of negroes being elected, the whites will retire from the House.

It is proposed to wing-dam Harrison river at its shallow portion near Harrison Lake thereby creating a current which shall render the river navigable all the year round. The estimate cost of this improvement is $7000.

A small stern wheel steamer is being built at Victoria to ply as low stages of water on the Harrison river, and between Hope and Yale. Her dimensions are seventy-three feet length, fourteen foot beam, and three and a half feet hold.

The little steamer Caledonian, which has been thoroughly repaired and repainted is about to resume her trips between Victoria and Esquimalt.

The House of Assembly at Victoria, and the newspapers, are briskly discussing the relations of Church and State in Vancouver's Island, in a question whether a five-year engagement with the Rev. Mr. Cridge the Colonial Chaplain, which is just about expiring, should be renewed.

The crime of selling liquor to the Indians about Victoria is very severely dealt with by the authorities, and yet it cannot be put down. Several parties had been fined recently for committing this offence; among others, one A. Moore, a boatman between Victoria and Esquimalt, was fined $100, or in default thereof, two months imprisonment with hard labor.

Freight per steamer from Victoria to New Westminister, Fraser River, has been reduced to fifty cents per ton, and the rate of passage fare is down to the same low rate of fifty cents.

The Boundary Commission expect to establish the line between the United States and British Columbia as far east as Fort Colville by the commencement of winter, when they will be compelled to relinquish their work for the season.

The Stailacom Herald has the following extract from a private letter from San Juan Island:—

"We are now making fortifications and entrenchments to enable us to hold our position against a much larger force than John Bull has at this part of the world. The town or city of San Juan, which consisted, when we arrived, of one tenant, now contains some ten or fifteen buildings, consisting of stores, bakehouses, dwellings, &c., It is wonderful to see the progress of the American people. If the town should continue to grow as fast for three months to come, it will undoubtedly be the largest city in Washington Territory."

THE EMPEROR ALEXANDER AND THE SERFS.

When the deputation of the nobles of Russia, who lately arrived at St. Petersburg to discuss the first part of the proposed law for the emancipation of the serfs, waited on the Emperor at Tsarskoe-Selo, on the 16th ult., his Majesty addressed them as follows:—

"Gentlemen,—I am most happy to see you. I have called you to assist in a work which interests myself not less than you, and of which you desire the success as much as I do. The future prosperity of Russia depends upon it. I am certain that my faithful nobles, who have ever been devoted to the throne, will zealously second me. I considered myself as the first noble in the empire when I was yet heir-apparent. I was proud of the title. I am proud of it still, and I continue to look upon myself as forming part of your class. I have undertaken this work with entire confidence in you, and with the same confidence I have summoned you here. To enlighten you as to your duties, I have had instructions drawn up which have been communicated to you. They have been misunderstood. I hope that all misunderstandings have now disappeared. I have read your letter, which was presented to me by Iavok Ivanovitch, [General Rostovzeff.] My answer has been communicated to you without doubt. You may rely upon it that your opinions which coincide with that of the commission will enter into the regulation drawn up by it as the others, even those who may not agree with its opinion, will be presented to the central committee and laid before me. I am well aware, and you are convinced of it yourselves, gentlemen, that this work cannot be accomplished without sacrifices, but I wish those sacrifices to be made as light as possible. I will endeavour to aid you, and I rely on your assistance in the firm hope that you will justify my confidence in you, not only by words, but by deeds. Adieu, gentlemen."

A DELICATE POINT OF LAW.

From the New York Tribune.

There is a suit pending before the Court of Common Pleas involving the right of Aldermen and Common Councilmen to hire carriages at the public expense. So far as the present claim is concerned, very few members of both Boards dissent (to its having been formally incurred in the discharge of their official duties, and that on two occasions the plaintiffs carriage enabled some of them to attend the meeting, while suffering from illness. We do not, we confess, delight to touch of the picture which this calls up, of pelf and vote, but high-strung Aldermen carried into the Council chamber and hearing out their Ayes and Noes in behalf of the rest of our Aldermen, who had remained at home comfortably in bed, and we are heartily ashamed to see the dignity of our Municipal City [illegible]

Fathers not to run such risks too often.—There is a limit to human endurance. A high-souled absorption in public duties may enable a man of easy temper to live various discomfort for an hour or two now and then, without subsequent injury; but then, bad consequences may ensue. There is no knowing; and when we consider how dependent this city is upon the present members of the City Government for its safety and happiness, we must solemnly call upon them not to run any more such hazards.—They owe it to their country to stay in bed and get well of their pains and aches, no matter what jobs await them, or how seductively the free lack may stand at the door.

As the hacks have been used, however, and the sum charged for them is small, we hope the decision of the Court will allow them to be paid for. The main object we see to it is the danger that it may establish a somewhat awkward principle. There is, as the public is doubtless aware, a large number of members of the Common Council who consider their daily "drinks" even more necessary for the discharge of their official duties than carriages. Many of them, we are satisfied, feel it to be impossible to enter upon grave political business without having taken a certain number of "smashes," or "cocktails," or "punches," to clear their heads. It would be somewhat inconvenient, and might furnish materials for scandal and silly jokes to idle gossips, if the Comptroller had to settle the Common Council bar bills; and yet, if our distinguished rulers are left to judge in one case what personal conveniences are needful for the discharge of their duties, we do not see how the privilege can be denied them in the other.

Desperate Encounter with Convicts on Board Ship.

The Overland Bombay Standard of Sept. 2, gives the following account of a desperate encounter, with convicts on board the "Ararat," which at that date was in Bombay harbour:—

With 50 pirates on board, 12 ordinary victs, a guard of 15 European Madras artillery men, and eight Sepoys of the Marine battalion, the 'Ararat' left Singapore on the 19th of June, and arrived at Penang in the evening of the 24th. 32 convicts were there added to the gang, making 74 in all.

The "Arrarat" left Penang in the evening of the 25th, a junk leaving at the same time, and doing her best to keep up with the ship. Captain Correya, not liking the appearance of things, dodged his satellite, and finally lost sight of his craft on the evening of the 27th. A few hours later, the "Ararat" was some 60 miles from Penang.—The 28th broke gloomily, very dark, and sharp gusts of wind. At 2 45 the captain ordered the mate to set top-gallant sails if the weather should clear, and lay down again on the poop. His rest was of short duration. Ten minutes later he was aroused by a noise such a one as wakens a man broadly in an instant.

The noise, a crash as of something giving way, followed by a shout, startled the mate whom he was standing, by the break of the poop. There was no doubt as to the cause—the convicts had broken loose. Quick as thought the captain leaped to the deck and brought his arms—a revolver and two pistols—from the cabin. The mate as instantly aroused the guard, at the same time hailing the sentry forward, but receiving no reply. He remained by the night-guard muskets until the guard turned out, before which the captain's revolver spoke from the poop. The captain, it seems, on reaching the deck could just discern that the convicts were making their way aft. They had advanced as far as the stern of the long-boat when he fired into them. Still they came on, a tumultuous rush, yelling like fiends, and heaving before them hooks, hand-spikes, holy-stones, firewood, curry-stuff grinders—anything, in fact, they could lay hands on.

Captain Correy was severely struck by some of these missiles, as were also several of the guard, who had by this time joined the captain (the crew, Lascars and Spaniards, being altogether without arms, having made their way into the rigging) on the poop. The gallant party had no thought, however of acting merely on the defensive, but jumping to the quarter-deck commenced a hand to hand fight with the scoundrels.—Both captain and guard fired into them as fast as they could load, using also their cutlasses and bayonets to keep them at bay.—They had desperate men to deal with. No sooner was a musket fired than a rush was made upon it before it could be reloaded, but in no instance did they succeed in wrenching it from the grip that held it for life or death. One bayonet was their only spoil.—During the whole time they kept up a shower of the missiles described above, and it is only wonderful that more mischief was not done by them.

Inch by inch, however the captain and his party gained ground, advancing purposely with caution, lest from behind the water-casks a rush might be made upon them, and their arms—their salvation—be seized.—And here we have to record an instance of courage as rare as heroic. Some ten minutes or so after the outbreak, amid an uproar as if of hell let loose, arising from men who were thirsting for blood, the captain's wife took her part in the fray, by loading and continuing to reload her husband's pistols, and passing them up from the cuddy skylight. As each was gained, it was seized by the guard and fastened down. After an hour's hard fighting, the convicts were driven on the top-gallant forecastle, where they were charged with the bayonet, and several run through or driven over the bows. Two or three were seen to lay hold of the fore top-gallant studding sail, which was lying on the forecastle, and jump overboard with it. They were shot from the poop and quarter-deck as well as the darkness permitted their being made out.

The deck was now clear, lights were brought; many attempts had been made to put lights during the fight, but as soon as one appeared it was knocked over by the convicts, and the whole work was done in almost total darkness. The sights which the lights revealed were the horriblest.—Here a man with a gashed face, there another riddled with the bayonet, there one—yet living, with four bullets through him. The aspect of the place was that of a slaughter-house. Eight dead bodies were found on the forecastle, and three on the main deck, including the European sentry and Portuguese cook. It was now apparent why the sentry had not answered the hail of the mate—the poor fellow was found to have been stabbed to the heart. There seems, unfortunately, to be no doubt, that he had left his post below, and came on deck, where he is supposed to have fallen asleep, being stabbed without awakening or to fire his pistol, which was in his hand as he lay. Had he been at his post, or even awake on deck, alarm might in all probability have been given sufficiently early to have prevented the convicts gaining the deck at all.

The poor cook was shot by accident being mixed up with the convicts. The carpenter and an Arab passenger jumped overboard. The former fell into the hands of the low [illegible]

[illegible] the way of. The Arab was never seen again.

At daybreak, a man was found hanging on to the rudder. A rope being let down he was hauled up, and was found to have been shot through the leg. On search being made below, five more bodies of men were found, who, on receiving enough, had gone below to die. It was found that the convicts had escaped by cutting through with a knife—of which they had somehow gained possession—a bar of a prison door forward, then partly cutting through the inside partition bar on the port side, which enabled them to burst the door in altogether. They then shouted to the rest in other cells to follow them, which, the exception of fourteen, at the guard, were enabled to keep down they did.

At six, the convicts were mustered, and it was found that 28 were dead or missing—28 out of 60 who came on deck. The remaining 32, with the exception of three wounded, were treated to three dozen dozen each. At half-past nine, the sentries gave the alarm that some of the convicts had slipped their leg-irons. The guard was called and secured them. On overhauling the remainder, it was found that many of the irons were too large and they were accordingly reduced. A welcome sight must that have been to the "Ararat."

Robbery in Burford.

Mr. Force, a farmer, residing in the township of Burford, was robbed on Saturday night last, of upwards of $300. The deed is supposed to have been effected through the use of chloroform, as on Sunday morning Mr. Force and all the members of his family experienced a strange sensation, approaching to a feeling of sickness. During the morning Mr. F. thought he would look after his money, the proceeds of the sale of his wheat which he had received the night previous, and had allowed to remain in the pocket of his trowsers.—What were his feelings when he discovered that his treasure was missing can be more easily imagined than described. It at once came with force to the minds of the family that the robber must have put them all under the influence of chloroform in order to effect his purpose. No clue has, as yet been found of the rascal or rascals. This circumstance ought to be a warning to farmers to be more careful in putting away safely their money, especially large amounts. —Courier.

Intemperance in Stratford.

A vote was taken lately in Stratford on a Prohibitory Liquor By-law, when 79 voted for it, and 109 against it. There are 500 votes altogether there, so that it would appear that very little interest was taken in the subject on either side.

Valuable Property

FOR SALE,

On Liberal Terms of Credit.

PUBLIC AUCTION.

WILL be sold on the premises, in the Town of Peterborough, on Wednesday, 2nd Nov., 1859,

at the hour of Two o'clock in the afternoon,—by virtue of a power of sale in that behalf, contained in a certain Indenture of Mortgage, dated the Fourth day of November, A. D., 1857, and made by John Glass of the Town of Peterborough in the County of Peterborough, Merchant, of the first part, and Harriet Glass, his wife, of the second part, and George Cumming and William Copley of the said Town of Peterborough, Merchants, of the third part; All and singular those certain parcels or tracts of land and premises, being Town Lots, Numbers Three and Four on the North-west side of George street, in the Town of Peterborough; together with all the houses, buildings and erections thereon, and all appurtenances thereunto belonging.

The above property is situated in the flourishing town of Peterborough, and is within two hundred yards of the Port Hope and Peterboro' Railway Depot, with which a connection could be made at a trifling cost. There is a large and substantial building on the property, which was built and fitted up for Distilling purposes, but never having been used, could be turned into Flour Mills or any kind of Manufactory at a comparatively trifling expense. It is particularly adapted to either Distilling or Brewing purposes on a large scale, as it contains all the Tubs, Shafting, Copper works and Machinery necessary for that business, constructed on the most approved principles. A considerable stream running through the premises furnishes never failing supply of water, and might readily be used in conjunction with steam as a motive power.—There is a new Engine and Boiler in the building which cost $2000. These are of the most approved make, are very powerful, and have never been used. The Outbuildings are well built, and are capable of Stabling two Hundred head of Cattle. Altogether the property will be found one of the most desirable investments for Capitalists, Manufacturers or others to be met with.

TERMS OF SALE,

One fourth down, and the remainder in equal payments, at ONE, TWO AND THREE years. For further particulars apply to

F. G. CALLENDER,

Surgical and Mechanical Dentist,

KNOWN to the inhabitants of Peterborough and vicinity, for the past 12 years, intimates that he will continue to visit Peterboro', on the first Monday in each month, for the week, prepared to perform all operations of the profession, in defiance of competitors as to neatness and durability, (except filling teeth with platina, it being a substance not then used by the profession.) He is also prepared to insert Teeth on Vulcanized Rubber, a much approved new style, being free from taste, much cheaper than Gold, and is said to be equal in neatness and durability, and much more agreeable in the mouth, being less weighty.

Public attention is invited to the above. Rooms over Mr. Clexton's Store.

$100 A YEAR,

AND upwards saved to the Farmers, by ALDUS MOWRY'S

CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 16 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

PRICES &c.

All orders directed to "M. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.

The Inventor, Aldus Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.

Address, "Aldus Mowry, Peterboro', C. W."

N. B.—Any persons infringing upon this Patent, will be prosecuted to the utmost extent the law will allow. Patent dated March 16th, 1859.

Peterborough, April 21st, 1859. 18

PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE
BETTER THAN
EXPERIMENTAL SCIENCE.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE SUFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilized alike, has proved that simple eruptions, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developments of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of inflammation and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and permanently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and using as a dressing, this inestimable Ointment.

Scrofula, Erysipelas, and Salt RHEUM.

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysipelas, can long withstand its influence.

Bad Legs, Old Sores, and Ulcers!

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Eruptions of the Skin,

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic disease, are eradicated, and a clear as if transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Piles and Fistulæ.

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede his application. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Nipples,
Fistula,	Sore Heads,
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Stone of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Sores,
Piles,	Salt Rheum,
Rheumatism,	Tetter,
Ringworm,	Ulcers,
Salt Rheum,	Venereal Sores,
Scalds,	Wounds of all kinds.

☞ Caution!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London" are discernible as a Watermark in every leaf of the book of directions, which may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

☞ Sold at the manufactory of Professor Holloway, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicines throughout the United States and the civilized world, in pots at 25 cents, 62 cents, and $1 each.

☞ There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are affixed to each pot.

For the Mother's Sake.

A young man, who had left his home in Maine ruddy and vigorous, was seized with the yellow fever in New Orleans; and though nursed with devoted care by friendly strangers, he died.—When the coffin was being closed, "Stop," said an aged woman who was present, "let me kiss him for his mother!"

Let me kiss him for his mother
Ere ye lay him with the dead
Far away from home, another
Sure may kiss him in her stead.
How that mother's lips would kiss him
Till her heart should nearly break!
How in days to come she'll miss him!
Let me kiss him for her sake.

Let me kiss him for his mother!
Let me kiss the wandering boy;
It may be there is no other
Left behind to give her joy.
When the news of joy the morrow
Burns her bosom like a coal,
She may feel this kiss of sorrow
Fall as balm upon her soul.

Let me kiss him for his mother!
Heroes ye, who by his side
Waited on him as a brother
Till the Northern stranger died,—
Heeding not the foul infection,
Breathing in the fever breath,—
Let me, of my own election,
Give the mother's kiss in death.

"Let me kiss him for his mother!"
Loving thought and loving deed,
Seek not tear nor sigh to smother,
Gentle matron, while ye read.
Thank the God who made you human,
Gave ye pitying tears to shed;
Honor ye the Christian woman
Bending o'er another's dead.

THE STORY OF DICK DUFF.

Dick Duff, the lieutenant of our light company in 1812, was one of the happiest fellows in the British service. He sang and was merry from morning till night, and was occasionally uproarious from night till morning; and not even all the horrors of the retreat from Burgos could repress his flow of spirits. Moreover, he was the terror of inkeepers, and made the lazy hostalleros and keepers of posadas attend to his various commands with a celerity that astonished themselves; for Dick Duff could swear with marvellous fluency in Spanish and five other foreign languages; he had served at Malta, in Egypt, and Holland; and was wont to boast that he had acquired the whole vocabulary of oaths. This was highly necessary, Dick was wont to allege, "lest in the casual war of words with any ragamuffin on whom one might chance to be billeted, an officer and gentleman should have the disgrace of being put down by the sauce piquant of a rascally forsigner."

Dick had joined the service as a full private, in the year 1800, having been then forced into the ranks by the chief or landlord.

He was the second son of a respectable sheep farmer on the mountains of Mull, where his fore-fathers resided for ages.—His elder brother Hamish, when a child, had been swept out to sea (while playing among the fisher-boats on the beach,) and was drowned, to the grief and dismay of his parents, to whom a wandering Scottish priest, Father John of Douay, had foretold his birth, and predicted his future usefulness and greatness in the church. His mother an old Catholic of the house of Keppoch, looked on this elder child as blessed by Heaven, and in the fullness of her heart she gladly dedicated it to the then oppressed Church of her forefathers, in token of which she had tied to his neck a valuable amulet.

Their landlord, like many other Scottish feudatories in the year 1800, became desirous of appearing a person of importance in the eyes of the Government; to this end he resolved to raise a kilted regiment among his tenants, and on procuring a letter of service, immediately called upon them for their sons.

These tidings caused some consternation in Argyleshire, a county from which every war, prior to 1800, had swept at least four thousand of its best men, few of whom ever survived to return.

The aged father of Dick appeared with others before their feudal tyrant, who threatened to deprive every parent of his farm, if his sons delayed or declined to volunteer for service; and this can easily be done, as the Highland crofter has seldom a written lease to show, believing that the old hereditary cabin of his forefathers is his, as much as the air he breathes, or the heather he treads on.

"Duncan Duff," said the laird, who had already donned the uniform of colonel, "I am raising a regiment for the king's service and must have your son Dick; he is a very stout, native fellow, and here is the bounty."

"Please yourself, Duncan," resumed the feudatory; "I have only to warn you that another person has made my foster an advantageous offer for your farm, and your son's enlistment or his disobedience will materially influence me in considering the said offer."

"My croft, sir! Have not I and my fathers been hereunder your family for four hundred years and more; and is not our blood the same?"

"Stuff! I tell you that I must have a thousand men, and cannot spare your son."

"I had another son, sir—a poor child who was drowned in his infancy; had he lived one should have gone to battle, and one remained—but God doeth all things well."

"Peace not," was the dogged reply; "men I want and men I shall have"—and the letter of service gave the laird an opportunity of continuing all his allowances of dry humour.

Dick—for so the name of the lieutenant is familiarly abbreviated—became a soldier much against his will, and was sent to the depot at Chatham, to undergo the usual drill. Here he was noted for his dogged courage, his boundless generosity, and his reckless gaiety; he became a favorite with his comrades, and a terror to the sergeants and corporals, who found him a most troublesome recruit. Dick was always in a row, and always in the guard-house, and was constantly reported for drunkenness, insubordination, and neglect of duty.

Dick was a long time in the ranks, and was only promoted to the grade of corporal for saving the life of his colonel, who was then wounded and taken prisoner. Dick's promotion was rapid, and after passing through the intermediate ranks, he found himself, by his own merit, as lieutenant in the Highland regiment of this obscurious laird in the year 1806; and his reason for leaving it and exchanging into ours, was a mishap that occurred to him in Glasgow.

His corps had been quartered for a year in the barracks of the Gallowgate in the capital of the west, and Dick, who was decidedly of convivial, and scandal whispered of somewhat nocturnal, habit, and having, moreover, a high appreciation of the virtues of Glasgow punch, was in the habit of going home every night in the highest mood of mind; and on more than one occasion was assisted by the friendly arm of the watchers and warders of the civic guard or of the corporal of the patrol. The regiment marched for Edinborough, changing quarters with the brave old Pompadours, who were so called from the color of their facings resembling Madame's gown; but Dick having obtained a month's leave between returns, resolved to enjoy himself a little longer among his old haunts, and remained behind, exulting in freedom from duty and the seclusion of mufti.

A week after the regiment marched, Dick Duff found himself about midnight propped against a lamp-post in the High-street, with very vague ideas of his own name, rank and residence, and seriously weighing in his own mind whether the pavement and row of lamps extending to the right, of those that lay to the left, led to the barracks, for his faculties were so cloudy that he had become utterly oblivious as to the circumstance of his being on leave, in plain clothes, and living at a west-end hotel.

After long and serious pondering, Dick instinctively discovered the right way by old habit, and proceeded somewhat deviously, of course, through the delightful locality known as "the Sautmarket," and along the Gallowgate, until he found himself before the dark gate of the barracks, and heard the familiar step of the great-coated sentry pacing slowly to and fro inside. Here he kicked with vigor, and struck up his favorite mess-room song:

"Who knows but our girls—
(We have known stranger things!)
When once they've got feathers,
May make themselves wings;
And like swallows in winter,
May soon take their flight;
And for lovers of 'ours,'
Bid their husbands good night!"

"Hallo! gate—gate!" shouted Dick, sprawling against it with outstretched hands.

"Who come there?"

"Friend; particular friend of yours my boy—very."

The drowsy sergeant of the guard unfastened the barrier, and sulkily passed a lantern once or twice across the face of the visitor till it was knocked out of his hand by Dick, who exclaimed:

"D— it, sir, what d'ye mean? light me to my quarters."

"I beg pardon, sir!" said the sergeant, who thought Dick might be one of the staff; but the lantern was extinguished, as our friend resumed his song, and stumbled on alone to the old stair-case, with which he was quite familiar; and ascending by mere force of habit to his room, found the door-handle on the right as usual, and he entered.

"All right," muttered Dick, "all right. Here's the bed-post—and the candlestick should be here."

But he could neither find candle nor matches, and resolving to "row" his man in the morning, he threw off his clothes, tumbled headlong into bed, and was soon sound asleep.

Now it happened that the proprietor of the aforesaid quarters was the officer of the main-guard, who, as the next day proved Sunday was to come off duty at eight o'clock a. m., and duly at the hour of seven his servant entered to prepare a fire and lay breakfast. Hearing a vehement snore proceed from his master's bed the servant drew back the curtains, and to his no small surprise, discovered the dark, sun-burned, and well whiskered visage of a stranger, whom he immediately awoke; but not without considerable difficulty and after reiterated efforts.

"Who are you?" grumbled Dick; "and what the devil do you want?"

"What do you want here?"

"Where, old fellow?"

"In my master's bed."

"Master's bed, you scoundrel!" stuttered Dick; "how dare you intrude into an officer's room? be off, or I shall send you to the shop in a minute." And so, Dick Duff, believing that he had settled the little mistake satisfactorily, again composed himself to sleep while the servant hurried to the main-guard to acquaint his master that "a thief was in possession of his bed and quarters." Three lodgings promptly brought up the officer with his sword in his hand, and a file of the guard at his heels.

Dick was once more aroused, and wrathfully, too, (from his slumbers, to find by his bedside five soldiers and an officer resplendent in a strange uniform.

"What do you mean, fellow, by this unwarrantable in-in-intrusion?" asked Dick with great dignity.

"Who are you, sir?" asked the officer in a louder key.

"You'll soon find out, sir—if you don't, or be heaven I'm parade you where, you won't know it. I have a pair of new-handled pistols that are the admiration of the whole brigade."

"What the devil can you plead in my quarters?"

"Your quarters!"

"Yes, sir, quarters!"

"Come off the guard."

"Dem it, sir, you're drunk."

And Dick, who was still very groggy, again addressed himself to sleep. Trembling with anger, the Pompadour for a moment doubted the evidence of his own senses; but seeing all his own baggage and property in the room, and being certain that his brain was not turning, though the cool impudence of Dick confounded him, "Corporal of the guard," said he, in a gallant tone of anger, "turn out this insolent fellow, and march him to the cells."

"Handcuff—the devil," shouted Dick.

This imperative order made him spring up, and at this moment the recollection of the change of barracks, his month's leave, and the last night's potations, flashed upon him. Unhappy Dick was sobered in a moment, and his countenance fell, and he burned to explain—to apologize; but the Pompadour would listen to nothing. Our friend was ignominiously hustled from bed, hastily dressed, roughly handcuffed, and despite all his assertions that he was "an officer—an officer and a gentleman," etc., he was marched to the guardhouse, into which he would have been thrust, had not a staff officer, the friend with whom he had supped overnight, passed as at that moment and recognized him.

The officer explained, Dick expostulated, the Pompadour was sulky; but after fiery threats, mutual apologies and expressions of friendship for life were exchanged, and Dick dined that evening at the mess, of which he was made an honorary member; but the story "found vent," with a hundred absurd additions; and Dick was so quizzed about it by the small wits of his own corps, that he exchanged into Ours and joined us about the time Corunna was fought.

Earliest Idea of an Electric Telegraph.

Do you remember the words of Solomon: "Is there anything whereof it may be said, see this is new? it hath been already of old time which was before us." They came very forcibly into my mind t'other day when I was reading a charming book just published here La Correspondance Inedite de Mme. du Defland and my eye fell on the passage. It occurs in a letter written by the Abbe Barthelemy (the author of Anacharsis) to Mme. du Defland. The letter is dated 3rd August 1772. "I have often thought of an experiment which would add greatly to our happiness. Perhaps I have not exactly understood the experiment in natural philosophy you will correct my errors. I have heard that with two clocks whose hands were magnetised, a person had but to move one of the hands of one and the other would follow in the same direction, so that if he made one clock strike twelve the other would also strike twelve. Now suppose artificial magnets were brought to such a degree of perfection, their power could be communicated from Chanteloup to Paris (a distance of 150 miles,) you would have one of these clocks, and we another, and instead of the hours we would have the letters of the alphabet on the clock dials. Every day at a given hour we would turn the hands, Monsieur Wiart would note the letters and read: "Good day, dear grand daughter, I love you more tenderly than ever!"

"Grandmama turned the hands. When it came my turn to do so, I would repeat nearly the same sentiments. Other improvements might be made, such, for example, as arranging it so that the first motion of the hand might ring a bell which would give warning that the oracle was about to speak. This idea pleases me very much. It would soon be misused, however, by being applied to espionnage in political and military matters; but it would be exceedingly agreeable in friendly commerce." Is it not strange that seventy years before Mr. Morse invented the electro-magnetic telegraph it should be so nearly described in the highest state of perfection to which it has been brought by subsequent improvements! If the Abbe Barthelemy had only thought of wire between Chanteloup and Paris! Genius alone thinks of breaking egg ends, freighting kites with verses and connecting distant towns with the same slender metallic threads.—Paris Cor. of Boston Traveller.

Plagues and Pleasures of a Cottage.

No doubt there are many things very romantic about a cottage. Creepers for example. Why, sir, these creepers are the most mischievous nuisance that can afflict a family. There is no occasion for mentioning names, but—the deuce take all parasites. Some of the rogues will actually grow a couple of inches upon you in one days time but when all other plants are asleep, the creepers are hard at it all night long; stretching out their toes and their fingers, and catching an inextricable hold of every nail they can reach, oh finally, you see them thrusting their impudent heads through the very sashes. Then, the other host-head creatures, they are covered with vermin. All manner of moths—the most gracious grubs—shelly slugs—spider spinning, tailors passing the caterpillar—earwigs and slaters, they would raise the gorge of a country cutter—wood-lice—the thrush or gentle's potato diggers—jointworms—the many-legs; in short, the whole kingdom of animal life, from Virgil's bristly Cacus the hedgehog, half an hour, and you will find yourself amid entomology and zoology. Then there are no pleasing down the churchyard. All those beauties you drive more opposite, the passengers, kind-hearted gentlemen behind your pew, A moth, perhaps puts your humbler of cold water, and down trickles the whole of the ink on the bridal bill of fare. All the organs of the parish church seem to commence the days they have to play, and perform. Then you have the pleasure of the parish meeting, the dogs fight, and you have to separate them, and perhaps get your head broken in the scuffle, and finally, the parson himself comes down the street, and you have to stand bareheaded and bow to him. Oh, sir, cottages are all very well, but they are not pleasures.

LECTURE ON JUDAISM.
THE SYNAGOGUE AND THE GRAVE.

The Rev. Charles Freshman, late Rabbi of the Jewish Synagogue in Quebec, delivered last night his concluding lecture, on the habits, customs, religious belief and observances of the Jews. The United Presbyterian Church, Bay street, lent for the purpose, was well filled with a very attentive audience. The pastor, Rev. Dr. Jennings, introduced the lecturer to the audience.

Rev. Mr. Freshman said he had engaged this evening to deliver his fourth lecture. He had promised to follow the Jew from his cradle to his grave, so that in this way he might make his hearers acquainted with all the customs and ceremonies, and with the religious belief of the descendants of Abraham. He (Mr. Freshman) would now commence by giving a description of the Cabalistic book of the Jews. The Jewish Cabala is divided into two parts. The first part was speculative, the second practical. The latter they made use of for the accomplishment of their imaginary miracles. The Jews of Russia and Poland were in this respect very superstitious, so, that in case any of them are condemned to death or punishment, they believe by having recourse to this practical Cabala they could make their escape, but the (the lecturer did not find it had proved of any great advantage, except in the historical books published relating the miracles performed. They also pretended to cure sick persons in the following manner. They wrote down certain mysterious words on a piece of paper which was then burned, and the ashes given to the patient in a glass of water. He (Mr. Freshman) had never tried the receipe, neither had he ever heard of any cure being effected by its use. The other part of the Cabala, the speculative; related to the influence of the stars, and many other things of a like nature which had no foundation except in the "whimsies" of the Jewish doctors. Before a Jew entered a synagogue, he knocked thrice at the door with the key, imagining that the souls of the departed were assembled together for prayer, and at that signal, departed.—They also kissed the door-posts of the synagogues, and many of them, especially the women framed their prayer-books. They considered it a bad omen for one of their prayer-books to fall down to the ground, and if such a thing happened to their physicians, that day they fasted. All the Jews did not do this, but when he (Mr. Freshman) spoke of Jews he means those who strictly kept the laws of their religion.—In every synagogue was a scroll of parchment on which was written the five books of Moses. If such a scroll happened to fall to the ground, according to the Rabbis it was the duty of the whole congregation to fast the whole day. They were forbidden to fall down on their knees except on New Year's Day, and on the Day of Atonement. On these days, whilst the rabbi, or minister, or reader, read the prayers, the whole congregation ought to go down on the knees and pray with them. The lecturer then read from a letter which had appeared in the Israelite newspaper, edited by a Jewish rabbi, Dr. Wise of Cincinnati.—The letter was written from New York and Mr. Freshman read it in order that his hearers might gain some idea of the present condition of the children of Abraham in the United States. The writer of the letter said that the friends of progress in the three congregations which assembled in New York, began to feel that it was not at all right. They paid their contributions to their congregations, but received only disappointment in return. They were consoled with the hope of better times to come but they did not come. Not a word of instruction was given to their children, not a word was given to the adults. They still continued to pray for their chief officers in Babylon, who had been in existence for the last 3,000 years. They still cried incessantly about persecution, misery, and the reproach to which they were exposed, although they lived in a land of liberty and enlightenment. They prayed, in a republic for a Messiah, for a King of the Jews, although if the prayer were granted, they would not allow a King to reign over them. They still prayed for restoration to Jerusalem, although they would not go there, even though a hundred prophets should come.—Their bodies could barely read Hebrew neither could their leading men do it. In all the synagogues in New York there was but one man who had the least acquaintance with Hebrew literature. Their religion consisted of a set of prayer-books, phylacteries, &c.; in the keeping of fasts according to law, and in generally of the meetings of officers. "Verse" said the writer of the letter, "a musical to our song there." How thankful, remarked the lecturer, we ought to be that we did nothing of the with fables and traditions, that were destroyed the with Christ since. Mr. Freshman then proceeded to quote from the Talmud, passages which, in the opinion, apart from the Bible, must prove Jesus to be the Messiah, to those who believe that the Talmud was divinely inspired, and after delivering himself of some curious criticism which had been passed upon his former lectures, by persons unfavorable to what he had said, he passed on to describe the customs observed during the forty years during which the Israelites were in the wilderness. He said they looked upon it as a humiliating thing to wash, clothe, or shave. When a Jew proposed that he was going to be married, he was called, or if he died, he was buried. The ceremonies connected with the latter were very peculiar. At the moment of death, they opened the windows of the house, and poured out all the water in the house, in order that the soul might find a free passage. The body was then washed in a sheet, and a lighted candle set by the head. Before the corpse was placed in the coffin, it was prayed over. It was dressed in the finest dress every Jew got when he was married. Upon the head was placed the silken cap which he also received when married. The scarf on which he prayed was laid in the coffin under him. It was stripped all round, but the two corners, the strips from one side were torn off. Before the lid of the coffin was nailed on, the family came and begged pardon of the deceased for any wrong they had done him. After the interment the friends who had accompanied the corpse to the grave, washed their hands, and sat down on the ground. The nearest relations of the departed stood near freshened themselves with bread, wine, and hard eggs, but nothing to with their own hands, but having it presented by a stranger. The Jews believed in purgatory, upon the assertion of one of their Rabbis. This Rabbi related that he was taking a walk in the fields, when he met a spirit carrying wood on his shoulders. He asked him, "What do you do with this wood?" The spirit answered—"I have to carry upon my about days sufficient wood to keep up the fire of purgatory." The Rabbi asked him—"How long is it since you died." "A few weeks," replied the spirit. The Rabbi then asked him if he had a son, to which the Rabbi went, taught him a prayer for his father, and made him promise to repeat it every morning in the synagogue for eleven months.—Some weeks after the rabbi again met the spirit, who said to him—"Oh my father, you have redeemed me from purgatory, for that little prayer my son has prayed, have released me from my pains." Upon this for why said the lecturer, the Jews had based their belief in purgatory, and the prayer contained therein he (he) he offered up to some relation of every deceased person in the synagogue, each morning for eleven months. Mr. Freshman concluded with a few appropriate remarks. He said, in his lecture, he had followed the Jew from his cradle to the grave, and there he would leave him until that great day when Jew, and Gentile alike would have to give an account of their deeds done in the flesh. If his Jewish brethren would only take a moment into consideration the glorious truths of the Gospel, he was sure they would not re-seek without acknowledging him as their Messiah. "May the Lord hasten the time, when all the tribes of Israel shall acknowledge him as their Lord."

During the lecture the reverend gentleman incidentally gave the following account of his conversion. He had been to a prayer meeting in a Wesleyan Church and had heard the preacher quote the text, "Three were the only words which struck him. He returned home, and after thinking of them for two or three hours, fell asleep in his study. He dreamt that he was in his native country, Hungary, and that he was before a judge who asked him where he had been. He replied, in the United States. The judge asked for a passport and threatened him with punishment for treason unless he produced witnesses to prove the truth of his statement. He (Mr. Freshman) dreamt that he cried out that he did not want any witnesses, for he had seen "the great." He would not have related this incident had he not been requested to do so. Slight as the circumstance was, it was the accomplishment of his conversion.

At the conclusion of the lecture a collection was taken up, and the audience dispersed.

Odds and Ends.

There is thought in the very little tax in a priest's mutinous will, if the closest express his meaning by his tones.

A lawyer, once, upon repairing an invitation to dinner, communicated the fact upon having a chair-of-state assigned him.

A young man, in conversation one evening, chanced to remark—"I am no preacher." "I should suppose," replied the lady present, "no profit to yourself or any one else."

It is said that Lo Montaigne, the celebrated bookseller, was a descendant of the Canadian voyageurs without doubt, since he loves the Indian corn dance.

"I really believe," remarked Jack, "that you and your sisters will go to eternal fire and brimstone."

"Why, Jack?"

"Because you are always talking about the Devil."

Talmage the unbeliever says that the Jews took care to have public prayers put up for them in the synagogue. They also changed their names as soon as married, hoping by that means the disease would change also. When a Jew was in danger of death, he was never left alone, and immediately after the separation of his soul from the body, the parents who had premier must tear some portion of the garments of the dead. All the water in the house was thrown into the street. The body was wrapped up in a sheet, and a lighted candle set by the head. Before the corpse was placed in the coffin, it was prayed over. It was dressed in the finest dress every Jew got when he was married. Upon the head was placed the silken cap which he also received when married. Upon this for why said the lecturer, the Jews had based their belief in purgatory, and the prayer contained therein he (he) he offered up to some relation of every deceased person in the synagogue, each morning for eleven months. Mr. Freshman concluded with a few appropriate remarks. He said, in his lecture,

Abolition of Collectors' Fees.

The County Council of Huron have adopted the following report of a committee appointed to enquire into the necessity, propriety and expediency of petitioning the Legislature, praying for the abolition of legal authority for the collection of debts under one hundred dollars, or such sum as may be decided upon, consisting of Messrs. Dickson, Holmes, Rastall, Valentine and Gunn. Having considered the matter as maturely as the limited time at our disposal on this occasion will permit, beg leave to to report:—

After making due allowance for that portion of the destitution lately prevalent in a great extent of these United Counties, justly attributed to causes beyond human control, your committee are satisfied that a large proportion of the distress consequent on that destitution arose from the activity which prevailed for some years previously, in the suing process in the Division Courts. Through the result of this suing process, the poor settlers were, in many instances, completely fleeced and despoiled of their entire available means of existence, and left utterly destitute of resources when visited by the partial failure in the crops in 1859.

Your committee beg to be distinctly understood that they have no desire to lay the state of things to the charge of the Division Courts, notwithstanding the ruinous and exhorbitant extravagance of their costs, and the grinding oppression on the part of the individual officers of such Courts in certain instances of limited occurrence. The Division Courts, in the opinion of your committee, are but a necessary and inevitable consequence of the present state of existing laws for the recovery of small debts. And so long as the law furnishes a remedy for the collection of petty debts, and steps in as an extorting agency in the shape of a dun, in the transactions between man and man, in the nature of buyer and seller, an interference which, except in cases of a fraudulent nature, your committee are of opinion it is expedient, either on the grounds of justice or morality, to invoke; so long will the perpetration of the Division Courts, or some similarly oppressive and demoralizing instrumentality, be rendered necessary.

Your committee have neither time nor opportunity, at present, to investigate the records of the Division Courts, or to ascertain for themselves, from figures, the result of the operation of these courts for some years past. They have good reason to believe, however, that in a large proportion of the cases tried in these United Counties, and in the Counties adjacent thereto, the sum-total of the heartrending process of the seizure, sale and sacrifice of property, also, in too many instances, with the utter blasting and ruination of life prospects, in a pecuniary point of view, to say nothing for the consequent impoverization of the community as a whole, and the certain demoralization of private and public virtue, honor and justice, has resulted in barely paying the costs of action—leaving the debt still hanging over the devoted head of the ruined debtor, and in many instances beyond the reach of the relentless creditor. It will be thus seen that to a very great extent the present state of things, in regard to the collection of small debts, is alike ruinous to both debtor and creditor.

The application of the machinery requisite in working out the seizing process in the division Court involves the outlay of a large amount of unproductive labor which might be employed to a better advantage in the prosecution of more laudable pursuits. The judges of our County Courts, instead of being necessarily engaged in the harrassing and oppressive process of grinding the poor and the unfortunate in the collection of petty debts, would, by the abolition of this department of their duties, be enabled to devote a portion of their valuable time to objects of a higher and more elevating nature, involving the civil, social, educational, and moral welfare of the people.

It is urged that the abolition of these laws and Courts would necessarily lead to the total abolition of small credits, and consequently entail great hardship on the poorer and most industrous classes of the community. Your committee are satisfied that no such results would ensue. In all rural districts, and in towns and villages there are to be found numerous instances of men who have, for periods extending over many years, transacted business on this credit system, and who have rarely, if ever, sued a customer in the Division Courts. The honest and deserving customer would still have the same credit extended to him by the honest and confiding dealer, while this privilege is only withheld from the undeserving and imprudent.

Your committee are pleased to observe that this subject is worthy of the attention of a portion of the press, and the true friends of the general welfare of the people, in several parts of the Province. The results of the present system of debt and credit are the same everywhere, and your committee are of opinion, that no thinking man can fail to see that the late crisis through which we have been passing, and the continual depressed state of our financial and general business system, is, in a great measure, attributed to the petty credit system.

Your committee are fully aware that a change so great as is involved in abolition of all legal remedy for the collection of petty debts is an important matter, and must belong to a consideration, to some extent, of our entire commercial relations. They believe, however, that the present, from the experience derived from our recent trials, is a proper and desirable time to agitate for the abolition of these laws. They believe that the public mind and legislature are fully alive to the necessity of a thorough revision of our entire commercial system and business relations.

In conclusion, your committee beg to recommend that your commercial Board conference and instruct the Warden and Clerk to communicate with, and solicit the co-operation of, the various municipalities in County West, in reference to the promotion of this object by discussion, agitation and petition; and on behalf of the Council, to draft a petition to the three branches of Legislature, praying for the abolition of all laws authorizing the collection of debts under one hundred dollars in amount; these laws to remain, and be operative in their entire and fullness.

All which is respectfully submitted.

The Recent Bank Failures.

Two banks doing business in Toronto (the Colonial and International) closed their doors last week, leaving the holders of their notes to find where best they could their value. There was nothing in the general aspect of trade or business to lead to the suspension of these banks. The country is at present enjoying a high degree of prosperity. There has been no commercial failures, nor has the banks in question been known to have sustained any heavy losses of late. For aught that appears to the contrary, they closed just as fraudulent debtors do, when they found that they had got as much credit as they could expect to get. The managers of the one, with their carpet-bags in hand, took passage for the American side of the Ontario without so much as saying "good-bye;" and the managers of the other went through the operation of "a run" on its counter for a couple of hours, and then coolly announced that it could not redeem any more of its notes.—Both of these banks appear to have been of recent growth. They were established only a few years ago, on the unfortunate American principle. That is, a charter is procured by some speculative genius, aided by lobby influences. The charter is then put up for private sale and disposed of to the highest bidder. Then the series of operations so fully described by Mr. Cashier Jones in the Colchester Bank case, a few weeks ago, are put in practice. Finally after an existence of a year or two there is a crash—the rotten fabric, having no foundation, gives way, the public are victimized, and a new lesson is given in regard to the case with which public credulity can be imposed upon by cunning financiers.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.—By despatch from Washington, dated Nov. 3, we learn that the Postmaster General has concluded an arrangement with the Canadian Post Office Department by which the mails are to be transported for the sea postage weekly between Detroit and Liverpool, via Portland in winter, and the River St. Lawrence in summer.

The service is to commence by the trip of the steamer outward from Portland on the 26th inst. It is intended to have the mails, or such as there may thereby be expected, for and from the Western, Northwestern, and probably some of the Southwestern States, sent in closed bags between Chicago and Detroit on the one side, and Liverpool and London on the other; and for this purpose the British Post office Department has been requested to constitute Chicago and Detroit exchange offices for the United States and British mails.

On the side of Britain, Cork may also be constituted an exchange office. By the schedule the time between Portland and Chicago is to be forty-eight hours, and when the service commences there will be an unbroken line of railroad the whole way. This will be a very direct line between the far West and Europe.

TOWN COUNCIL.—There was a meeting of the Town Council on Monday evening last. Barely a quorum were present.—Accounts came in by the handful, but no report from the Finance Committee on these already presented. The Mayor had no business for the Council, or anything to say, until a certain reverend gentleman made his appearance, when it suddenly "struck" him that there was something which he should have mentioned before, viz:—exempting supporters of Separate Schools from the special School rate. He said he had made the thing all right, that the statutes were as clear as mud on the point, and the unjust tax would be removed forthwith. The gentleman in black departed, "his Worship" breathed easier, and everything again was silent until Mr. Bradfield moved that the Council adjourn for one week.

The Treaty of Peace.

The following is a summary of the Treaty of Peace, signed on Monday last:—

Zurich, Tuesday.

The following is an analysis of the Treaty of Peace concluded between France and Austria as signed by the Plenipotentiaries, but which has not yet received the ratification of the two Governments.

"The treaty commences with the usual preamble:—

"Desirous of putting an end to the calamities of war, and forming into a definite treaty the preliminaries made at Villafranca, the two Emperors have named their plenipotentiaries and communicated to them full powers, and the said plenipotentiaries have agreed to the following:—

"That peace is concluded, &c.

"France returns to Austria the Austrian steamers seized during the late war, but on which judgement has not been passed, &c.

"Austria gives up Lombardy, with the exception of Mantua, Peschiera, and as far as the frontier line fixed by a special commission the limit of which is already known.

"The Emperor of the French declares that he transfers those portions of Lombardy to the King of Sardinia.

"Then follow the articles concerning the fortifications, namely, the option for the employés of Piedmont and Austria to remain in the service of the two Governments, and to have the option of transferring within a year their goods to Piedmont, and vice versa; they would, however, retain their right to any property left behind them when they move their domicile from Austria to Sardinia, or from Sardinia to Austria.

"The pensions acquired by persons in Lombardy will be respected and paid by the new Government, which will be established, to those entitled to them, and in those cases, where it is so stipulated, to the widows and children of those pensioned.

"Then follows the settlement of the debt which is the subject of two articles, one of which is an additional aggreement for the mode of payment. According to these articles, Piedmont is to pay to Austria 46,000,000f. (Conventions Manze), and besides is rendered responsible for three-fifths of the debt of the Monte-Lombardo Venetian. Altogether the debt transferred to Sardinia amounts to 250,000,000f.

"Then follows Article 18, which runs thus:—

"Desiring that the tranquility of the Church and the power of the Holy Father should be ensured, and being convinced that this end could not be obtained in a more effective manner than by a system suited to the wants of the populations, and by reforms the necessity of which have been already recognised by the Sovereign Pontiff the two contracting parties will unite their efforts, in order that a reform in the administration of the States of the Church should be carried out by His Holiness.

"Article 19.—The territorial limits of the independent States of Italy, which did not take part in the last war, could not be changed only with the assent of the other Power of Europe which took part in forming and guaranteed the existence of these States. The rights of the Grand Dukes of Tuscany, the Duke of Modena, and the Duke of Parma, are expressly reserved by the high contracting Powers.

Article 20.—The two Emperors will assist with all their power to the formation of a Confederation of all the States of Italy the object of which will be the preservation of the independence and integrity of Italy, which will ensure the development of their moral and material interests, and will watch over the defence of the interior and exterior of Italy by means of a federal army.

"Venetia, which will remain under the rule of the Emperor of Austria, will form a part of this Confederation, and will participate in the rights and in the obligations of the federal treaty, the clauses of which will be established by the representatives of all the States of Italy.

"Article 21 stipulates that persons having taken part in the late events will not be attacked either in their person or their property, and can remain unmolested in the two countries.

"Article 22.—The present treaty shall be signed and ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Zurich within 15 days.

"Other articles stipulate—

"That Austria shall be obliged to free from military service the soldiers belonging to the territory which she gives up.

"Austria undertakes to restore the securities and deposits of private persons placed in the public establishments belonging to Austria.

"Article 26 grants to the religious establishments in Lombardy the liberty to dispose freely of their private and landed property, if the possession of such property is incompatible with the laws of the new government."

THE GREAT TRANS-ATLANTIC BALLOON.

Although from time to time some items of description have been furnished concerning the monster air-ship which has been constructed by Mr. T. S. C. Lowe, it may now be interesting to the reader to see a more connected account of the machine and the preparations for the voyage. The following particulars are taken mainly from an interesting letter to the Boston Herald:—

The fabric of the balloon is oiled twilled cotton. The pattern was cut from six thousand yards of this material, and was sewed together in eleven sections; the work was done by seventeen sewing machines, making three rows of stitches to each seam. When spread out upon the ground to receive its coat of varnish, it covered two acres. The netting is made of a cord of three strands, each strand consisting twenty threads, weighing in all one thousand pounds. The basket suspended from the contracting hoop to which the net is attached, is six feet in diameter; it is made of strongly woven wicker-work, about two inches thick; the sides are about four feet high, and are cushioned up with about canvas, making a circular room or cabin in the cities of which are windows.—This cabin is heated by a cavity furnished stove, coal being used instead of fire. A trap door, in the centre of the basket, when opened, discloses a rope ladder leading to a platform made of metallic life-boats 40 feet in circumference, each capable for this ship. It also has a Osborn engine, attached to a propeller. An end of this boat is a conical, of sufficient dimensions to [illegible] ship up of doors without [illegible] (Greek letter beta) [illegible] (Greek letter gamma) [illegible] (Greek letter delta) [illegible] (Greek letter epsilon) [illegible] (Greek letter zeta) [illegible] (Greek letter eta) [illegible] (Greek letter theta) [illegible] (Greek letter iota) [illegible] (Greek letter kappa) [illegible] (Greek letter lambda) [illegible] (Greek letter mu) [illegible] (Greek letter nu) [illegible] (Greek letter xi) [illegible] (Greek letter omicron) [illegible] (Greek letter pi) [illegible] (Greek letter rho) [illegible] (Greek letter sigma) [illegible] (Greek letter tau) [illegible] (Greek letter upsilon) [illegible] (Greek letter phi) [illegible] (Greek letter chi) [illegible] (Greek letter psi) [illegible] (Greek letter omega) [illegible] (Greek letter alpha) [illegible] (Greek letter beta) [illegible] (Greek letter gamma) [illegible] (Greek letter delta) [illegible] (Greek letter epsilon) [illegible] (Greek letter zeta) [illegible] (Greek letter eta) [illegible] (Greek letter theta) [illegible] (Greek letter iota) [illegible] (Greek letter kappa) [illegible] (Greek letter lambda) [illegible] (Greek letter mu) [illegible] (Greek letter nu) [illegible] (Greek letter xi) [illegible] (Greek letter omicron) [illegible] (Greek letter pi) [illegible] (Greek letter rho) [illegible] (Greek letter sigma) [illegible] (Greek letter tau) [illegible] (Greek letter upsilon) [illegible] (Greek letter phi) [illegible] (Greek letter chi) [illegible] (Greek letter psi) [illegible] (Greek letter omega) [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

PHONOGRAPHY, OR WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nearly the great popularity by, by which and pa. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six; So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hours daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The Rev. Henry Ward, M.P., upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the Manual of Phonography, and the Phonographic Copy Book, post paid to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ELEVEN DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything can learn Phonography from the Manual without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 150 words per minute, should send, for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C, and ten times as easy to understand.

$100 A YEAR,

AND upwards saved to the Farmers, by ALDUS MOWRY'S

CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known to farmers. It is so simple that any person can run it, and requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 16 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by case-hardened cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

PRICE: $40.

All orders directed to "M. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.

The Inventor, Aldus Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.

Address, "Aldus Mowry, Peterboro', C. W."

N. B.—Any persons infringing upon this Patent, will be prosecuted to the utmost extent the law will allow. Patent dated March 16th, 1859.

SARTAIN'S GREAT TRUE!

SURVIVE OR PERISH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILL.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even derived from the experiences of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been adduced in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is repelled and exterminated by this searching, painless and irresistible curative.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this antibilious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this searching and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, lowness of spirits, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganization of the system, vanish under the eradicating influence of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SICKLY FEMALES

Should read how this is trying a few doses of this regulating and renovating remedy; whatever may be their complaint, it can be taken with safety in all periods and other disorganizations; its effect is all but miraculous.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases!

Asthma,	Headache,
Bowel Complaints,	Indigestion,
Coughs,	Influenza,
Colds,	Inflammation,
Chest Diseases,	Inward Weakness,
Costiveness,	Liver Complaints,
Dropsies,	Lowness of Spirits,
Dysentery,	Piles.
Dropsy,	Stone and Gravel,
Debility,	Secondary Symptoms,
Fever and Ague,	Venereal Affections.
Female Complaints,	Worms of all kinds.

CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernible as a Watermark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

 Sold at the Manufactory of Professor Holloway, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in boxes at 25 cents, 62 cents and $1 each.

N.B.—There is considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

[illegible] from the Mincio, Oct. 5, says:

"Any one taking the railway at Turin, and passing over the line by which the flood of war has rolled its waves from the Ticino to the Mincio, will have some difficulty in convincing himself that he is going over the country which three months ago was the theatre of a mighty war between three of the most powerful military nations of the Continent. It was will be best for all those formidable traces of devastation with which he has been accustomed to couple the idea of war. Ruined towns and villages, depopulated districts, fields devastated and trees cut, down, the absence of misery of the inhabitants, and flights of crows and vultures—nothing of the kind will he see, but a country smiling, rich, full of small towns and green fields, the inhabitants following their ordinary occupations, cattle grazing in the well-irrigated meadows or drawing the peaceful plough, as if war had never approached this fertile region, or as if every one had forgotten the mighty changes which have occurred since the spring. It will require some one who has been here during the late war to point out to the visitor some bridge or other which has been blown up, and which has been only temporarily repaired with wood, or to draw his attention to some half-effaced mounds, indicating the line of earthworks constructed by the Austrians during their advance. He will pass over the Pointe Nuove di Magenta without ever imagining the hard struggle of which it was the scene. Even the railway station of Magenta could not attract his notice were it not for a succession of wounds surmounted by wooden crosses which fill the hollow on the other side of it, or a number of boys hawking about shapeless leaden bullets and small Austrian double-headed eagles in brass, of the windowless house beyond the station, with some curious round holes through its wall. From Magenta to Desenzano he will find no traces, except perhaps of a solitary French gendarme at the station at Brescia. Disappointed if a sightseer, and rejoiced if a philanthropist, he will determine to start off for the battlefield of Solferino. At the entrance of the village he will be beset by "curio" sellers offering French conical shells and all kinds of trophies, just as if they had been employed in the trade for more than one generation. This will show him that he is treading the bloodstained soil of the battle-field of Solferino, but very little besides. The houses of the village are as they have been for years; he will climb up to the tower, and have a magnificent view, but nothing to remind him of war except a few holes in the crescente of the church on the top, and, if he goes on, some loopholes in the walls of the churchyard. This, with a few mounds which the officious guide points out as the burial-place of the heroes of Solferino, will be all that will remind him of the day on which the second greatest battle of modern time has been fought."

Glasgow and London.

From the London Times.

If London could blush any other color than smoke, it ought to have exhibited some signs of shame on Monday morning. It then read that at the touch of our Sovereign a provincial city four hundred miles off, wholly occupied by manufacturers, merchants, and ship-builders, with hardly the pretence of a "West-end," or an aristocracy, and with nothing to show but an old cathedral and some remarkably tall chimneys, had received the water of many noble lakes for the supply of its inhabitants. The grandeur of the undertaking is such that for parallel we must go back to the days when the mistress of the earth, with armies of slaves at her disposal, ransacked the Apennines for the pure waters of Hesperus, and drew them aqueducts forty or fifty miles across the desert Campagna. The peculiar nature of this work, indeed, rather resembles the angular perforations by which that enterprising city drew off and discharged within the streets and gardens the contents of some huge natural cauldron, once the crater of a volcano, now a woody mountain tarn. Seventy such tunnels, several of them a mile and a half long, now conduct to every house in the city of Glasgow the superfluous waters of Loch Katrine, and several others of those lochs so well known to the tourist. It appears they can afford to part with more than a week's supply to Glasgow on the most harsh scale without any sacrifice either of convenience or the picturesque. The storms that rage over the surrounding mountains and make every channel a torrent, which in a few hours finds its way to the sea, will henceforth be made to do many a good day's work in the humble abode of the Glasgow artisan. Greater engineers than those of the Eastern conqueror will divide the stream into many times more than 360 channels, and, if the tourist can spare a thought for the comfort of his fellow creatures, he may now reflect, as he gazes on the beautiful lakes before him, that all that many of water will pass through the hundred pipes and crop-cocks of Glasgow.—The expense of the work, of course is very great. We will not trouble our readers with the figures, but they are those of a railway; and we are ready to admit that many a branch line between two small country has cost a good deal more. What especially commends our admiration is the noble spirit which made the citizens of Glasgow go fifty miles, and bore seventy hills, to bring into their city the very best water that was to be got. None had a good right to it as the industrious and numerous population whom it is the fashion to charge with drunkenness, and describe as "crapulent." If this chemical be true, then the best remedy is Loch Katrine.

Can we not take a hint from the canny Northerners? Our manufacturing districts certainly lie under the fearful reproach of having no water fit to drink. In Wales and in the lake district there are many thousands of tons of water annually poured down the mountain sides, which would be a perfect boon to the dwellers in the valleys. Many of the towns in the north of England are in the same predicament. Some of the other towns in the vicinity of the Scottish lakes, Dundee, Perth, and others, have been long supplied with water from Loch Katrine, and there is a noble range of mountains and lakes within easy distance of Manchester, Liverpool, Bradford, and Leeds, which only wait the hand of enterprise to pour their waters into the dwellings of the people. Many of these towns, which are now obliged to sink wells, and cannot be supplied with water at a reasonable rate, would find it to their interest to follow the example of Glasgow, and bring water from a distance. The Mayoralty.

The time approaches when the rate-payers will be called upon to choose from their number a suitable person to fill the very honorable and highly important office of Mayor. As to the manner in which the present incumbent has filled the post, or the satisfaction he has given in the discharge of his duties, we shall say nothing at present, but only hope that the good sense of the Rate-payers will lead them to place in that responsible station at the approaching election one who will do it honor.

In another column will be found a numerously and a very respectably signed requisition, calling on A. Sawers, Esq., to come forward for the contest. That gentleman has consented, and judging from the names of individuals who pledge him their votes and influence, we would say an easy victory is his.

"One of the delegates from Peterborough showed great discrimination, when he declared yesterday that the whole affair was a farce and that he should go off by the 5 o'clock train."—Toronto Colonist, Nov. 11.

The ministerial journals on witnessing the great success that attended the Convention in Toronto last week, and, contrary to their expectations, finding the doors open to their reporters they were placed in a straight. To deny that the Convention was a success they could not, and to plead ignorance of the doings they dare not, so as they had "no defence" they must "abuse the plaintiff's attorney." Every puny little thing that could be brought against a member of the Convention was put forth as blinders on the public eyes; lies were manufactured by the column, abuse by the page, and finding all to fail an attempt was made to raise riot with the intention of breaking up the meeting by brute force. This scheme failed, but it was not the fault of the Ministerial press; the Leader and Colonist done their duty in calling it together. The city of Toronto is supplied with an efficient police force, and that alone prevented the disturbance. But to our extract—The Colonist tells us that a "Delegate" from Peterboro' declared the whole affair a farce. We have questioned all the delegates from Peterborough, Town and County, but every one in his turn denies having done so. We are told, however, by one of the delegates that an individual was present from this Town, who by some means or other gained admission to the Convention; (it could not be as a delegate, certainly, for no such person was appointed at any of the meetings in the County) who did use an expression similar to the one which the Colonist gives, but the person in question is not now, nor was he ever known to be in favor of the present Reform movement, and as he was neither a delegate from Peterboro' or, anywhere else, he was alone responsible for what he said to the Convention. That the Colonist could have mistaken him for a "delegate from Peterboro' is not at all possible, as when the individual in question rose to speak he was called down by a Peterboro' delegate as having no right on the floor. The Colonist dare not tell this latter fact but writes a long editorial, taking as his foundation the words of a person who had no more to do with the Convention, nor perhaps any more sympathy with it, than the editor of the Colonist himself. But something severe must be said against the Movement, and this would form as good a starting point for a falsehood as anything. So it is given to the world as a fact, and the poor deluded ministerialists must swallow it as truth, and then to give it effect every little lick-spittle sheet in the government pay in the Province, repeats it, with additions, telling their readers that it is gospel and they are prepared to swear to it.

A Mean Act.—We understand that Mr. Thos. Ryan, Gibraltar, has recently transplanted five girls, belonging to Arthur Carthy, under the following circumstances:—Mr. Thomas Ryan had a brother living in Antigonish, who it seems, had gained considerable wealth, and was the owner of a sizable plantation, with five negroes, a mother and her four children.—He (the brother) came to this part of the country on a visit to his friends, in July last, at that time he appeared in excellent health, and seemed to be as daring his stay in this vicinity; but on returning to his home in Arkansas was seized suddenly with sickness, and died after a short illness. Mr. Thos. Ryan of Gibraltar, was immediately telegraphed for, and he proceeded at once to ascertain the business required of him.—What brother having no legal title there to claim the property of the deceased, Mr. R. soon got possession of same, and commenced to sell off the negroes preliminarily, he started for home, but not without the five slaves, whom he transferred to Gibraltar, where they have benefits, the whereabouts of which is unknown to their former owner. They are now thankfully provided for by Mr. Ryan on his farm, where we hope they may long live to bless their generous and noble emancipator.

Fire.—On Tuesday morning about 3 o'clock, the stable and slaughter-house belonging to Mr. C. Boyd, on Dublin Street was destroyed by fire. One horse perished in the flames, and several valuable articles were consumed. Loss £180. No insurance.

There will be a special session of the Counties Council commencing on Tuesday the 29th inst.

Errata.—In our Report of the Reform meeting in Demorr last week, we inserted Thomas instead of George Choate, as Secretary.

The Reform Convention.

Toronto, Nov. 11, 1859.

Mr. Editor:—The proceedings of the Convention have just closed, and the result is beyond a question the entire success of the movement so far.

The response to the call of the Upper Canada Parliamentary Opposition, has been the assembling of such a representation from all parts of Upper Canada, as was never before collected on any similar occasion; and although it cannot be denied that in a social, political and commercial point of view very grave difficulties are apparent in the future of Canada—still on looking over the vast assembly, and marking the unmistakeable indications of intelligence, thought, respectability and energy which characterizes almost every individual composing it, one can scarcely fail to entertain the brightest anticipations for the future of that country which can supply such a representation.

On visiting the St. Lawrence Hall which had been named as the place of meeting, I found a large number of delegates already assembled, and pressing forward to have their credentials examined, and thus secure admission to the Convention, which it had been arranged should be done by ticket, signed by the Secretary.

One hour later the number had so increased that the Secretary and his assistant were literally besieged with eager applicants, and the crowding for precedence equalled that of a warmly-contested election poll.

Soon after noon, (the time appointed for meeting) the Convention assembled, and having organized by the appointment of the Hon. Adam Ferguson, Chairman, and John Scobie, Esq., Secretary, proceeded to deliberate upon the mode of procedure to be adopted, when it was agreed that five committees be appointed, viz:—Committee on Credentials. 2nd, On procedure. 3rd, On the resolutions to be submitted for consideration. 4th, On organization. 5th, On Finance—and in order to select these Committees from the members of the Convention a special committee was named—that committee met at once, and were able by 2 o'clock to report a list of names for each of the different committees which met the approval of the Convention. After receiving and adopting the report the Convention adjourned to meet at 7 p. m.

These committees were composed of gentlemen from all parts of the Province and supposed to represent the different views of the country—especially that on resolutions, which consisted of upwards of 30 members.

On again assembling, at 7 p. m., the several committees reported, and the report of the Committee on Resolutions was taken up for discussion, it having been arranged that the discussion on the resolutions should be conducted in Parliamentary rules—first a general discussion on the whole of the resolutions, and afterwards, in Committee of the Whole, on each resolution successively.

The debate was opened by the Hon. M. Cameron in an able and statesmanlike speech, in which he appeared, as he expressed himself evidently at home in his new position, as a member of the Upper Canada Opposition.

This must have been apparent to all who had an opportunity of observing his course for the last two Sessions of Parliament, in which he was found supporting a Government evidently holding views adverse to the interests of a majority of the people of Upper Canada, and politically associated with them with whom he could have no feeling or sympathy. What may have been the causes which induced this, it is not our purpose now to inquire into; it will suffice all to find that they have been removed or overcome, and that the honorable gentleman was then prepared to unite with others in using his talents, influence and energy in forwarding the best interests of Upper Canada.

Mr. Cameron was followed by some remarks from Mr. Oliver and others, with a view of eliciting explanations from the leading members of the Parliamentary Opposition, as to the reasons which had led to an apparent change of Policy on the part of the Opposition.

These remarks led the Convention to call for Mr. Sheriff, who appeared, and in one of the pertinent and telling speeches, for which that gentleman is so justly celebrated, denied that there was any change of policy, but that the events of the last two sessions had served to confirm them that the Reform was most imminent, and therefore that the interests of the country demanded immediate action. The speech which occupied the Convention until about 10 p. m., in deserving the attentive perusal of your readers.

Immediately on the close of his speech, the Convention adjourned to meet at 9 p. m. on the 10th.

In continuing next morning the Hon. Mr. Morrison was loudly called, who addressed the Convention in a short, compact, but able manner, [illegible] which seemed to meet the views of the majority of the Convention.

[illegible] I returned home, and was as a member of the Parliamentary Opposition to address my lengthened remarks to the Convention. The Parliamentary Opposition had considered it necessary to call the Convention to receive instruction for their future guidance, and their place would consequently be more that of listeners than speakers on the occasion. This feeling appeared to actuate most of the members present at the Convention, who, with the exception of Mr. Cameron and some of the members of the late Brown Dorion Cabinet, abstained from occupying the time of the Convention.

The second day was occupied in discussing the resolutions—the first four of which were adopted without amendment.

The fifth, which was the most important, after being amended, passed late in the evening, with only about half a dozen dissenting votes out of an assembly of between six and seven hundred of an attentive and anxious audience.

As the debates which took place have been fully reported, I need only refer to the spirit which seemed to govern the large assembly in all its proceedings, and which was most apparent in the debate.

From the commencement all seemed to feel that a great crisis was imminent—that some change was imperative, and that the Convention was to ascertain what that change should be. Gentlemen had assembled from all parts of the Province, holding various opinions as to the best remedy. These opinions were ably represented, both in the discussion of the Committees, and in the Convention, and after a most thorough canvass of the different views, a conclusion was arrived at, which secured the approval of all, and with that unanimity which is so desirable when great results are to be obtained.

On Friday the Convention was principally in discussing and adopting the report of the Committee of Organization, and recommending the formation of a Constitutional Reform Association.

This was done on the part of the Convention with a heartiness and enthusiasm which argues well for its final success.

The results of the gathering have now to be looked for in the action of the country.

From the enthusiasm and unanimity that prevailed there can be little question but there will be important. The present political position of the Province has been clearly laid before the electors, the best remedy for the admitted evils fully discussed, and a conclusion arrived at. The duty and responsibility of carrying out the discussion is left with the electors, who, I trust, will be prepared to perform this duty, and thereby secure the best interests of the country.

I am, yours, &c.,
OBSERVER.

"A RIGHTEOUS COMPLAINT."

To the Editor of the Examiner.

Dear Sir,—I now proceed to embrace the opportunity you have kindly offered me, by replying through the columns of the Examiner, to an article which appeared in the Review of the 29th April last, under the above heading, but previous to doing so, I beg to offer a few remarks in explanation.

My attention was first called to the article at Cobourg, on my way from Toronto on the 4th May. Under the impression that the editor was under a misapprehension as to the facts of the case, I wrote a letter from Cobourg promising an explanation on my return home. Unfortunately the article was a week old before my return, and as the Review does not appear to live so long in the esteem of its readers in Keene, I was unable to find my own copy or that of any of my friends for some days. At last I applied to the editor for a copy which reached me about the same time as one from a friend here. By this time I had become closely engaged in business, which my long absence from home rendered imperatively necessary, and was prevented from replying immediately. Meanwhile having occasion to visit Peterboro', and mentioning the article in conversation with some friends, I was then told that the remarks of the Review did not excite much attention, and that it was a matter of little importance whether a reply was made or not, and it was even said by some of the parties, that were they in my position they would not notice the article at all.

Having, however, promised to reply, I resolved to do so, but was delayed for some time, by my business occupations demanding all my time. I had nearly completed a communication on the subject, when having occasion to be in Peterboro' early in June, I called upon the editor of the Review to mention the reason of my delay. From the nature of his remarks on that occasion, and a paragraph in the next Review, I felt satisfied that it was not the interests of the constituency of Peterboro' which induced the Review to publish the article, but a desire to damage me, if possible in public estimation, and to draw me into a newspaper discussion, which should give some local interest to his paper, and thereby increase its circulation. Entertaining no fear of the consequences of the former, and having neither the leisure nor the inclination to gratify him in the latter, I then resolved to delay the explanation until I could find some other means of making them. Thus I now proceed to do as briefly as possible.

To reply to this complaint which is first,—That in the matter in question, I neglected the interests of Peterboro' personally.

2nd. That in my absence, I did not enlist the aid of my political friends, and consequently allowed the Bill to pass the Lower House, in an objectionable shape.

A simple statement of the facts, will show that the complaint is a most unrighteous one; these I will give:—

On receiving the petition of the Town Council of Peterboro', I at once spoke to Mr. Robinson, junr., M. P. P. for Toronto, the gentleman in charge of the bill, showing him the petition, and explaining the nature of the amendments necessary, a copy of which I handed to him. That gentleman expressed his willingness to make the amendment, and referred me to Mr. Galt, the solicitor of the company with whom I communicated, and from whom I received a copy of an amendment prepared to be submitted on my own. Meantime, I had received a copy of an amendment from the Town, drawn to suit their views, upon the insertion of which I insisted. Not having however succeeded in meeting Mr. Galt, and having the amendment inserted before the second reading, I opposed the bill at that stage in order to give notice of my intention. It was then promised that the amendment should be inserted in the Railway Committee to which the bill was referred. I attended the meetings of the Committee for several days, expecting it to come up, therefore, fearing it would come up in my absence, I supplied a copy of the proposed amendment to the Hon. Mr. Price, to William Powell, Esq., and to Mr. Berger, and spoke to the Hon. J. S. McDonald, and to Dr. Connor, explaining the amendment desired and describing who had copies of it.

That the matter stood on Friday the 9th April, when the Committee decided to adjourn its consideration until Tuesday the 12th.

[illegible] I returned home, and was unexpectedly detained by sickness until the 21st. Meantime, not doubting from the assurances I had that the bill would be carried for in Committee, I did not concerve any notice to Peterboro', or my other action on my part was necessary.

On my return to Toronto on the 21st, I found that the bill had passed, as I was told with an amendment, written in Committee by my political friend Dr. Connor, expressly with a view to protect Peterboro'. On referring to the bill as amended, I found that the amendment did not cover all the grounds, in consequence of a misapprehension on the part of Dr. Connor, as to the position occupied by Peterboro', it having been offered in evidence before the Committee that the Town of Peterboro', did not occupy the position of a stockholder, but held security by mortgage, a copy of the mortgage having been exhibited to strengthen this evidence. A close examination, however, disclosed the mortgage as only covering the lease and not the road, while Dr. Connor, in drawing the amendment made it protect all securities, held against the operation of the bill. Thus the misapprehension arose, and in the absence of the Hon. Mr. Foley, who was engaged in other and important business, and also of Walter Powell, Esq., the bill passed the Committee, as amended, and the House without opposition.

Finding the bill before the Legislative Council in this state, and understanding from the Hon. Messrs. Perry and Boulton of Cobourg, who seemed anxious to render every assistance possible to secure the interests of Peterboro', that it had been referred to a special committee, I waited upon some of the members of the committee.—At this meeting, I for the first time learned that Mr. Darey Boulton of Cobourg and Mr. Conger of Peterboro', were both there on behalf of Peterboro', and though I had been living in the same house with these gentlemen for some days before, neither had given me the least intimation of what was occurring with reference to the bill. Though I understood that the Committee had previously expressed themselves averse to any further amendments, I must do them the justice to say that they expressed their willingness after my representation, to meet the reasonable demand of the Town of Peterboro', which they afterwards did, leaving no cause for complaint on the part of the Town. In passing, I may mention here that a second petition from the Town of Peterboro', was forwarded to Toronto, by private hands, and only put into my hands on the afternoon of the day in which the meeting of the committee above mentioned had taken place, and after the matter had been decided, and it would be of no further use.

From the above it will be apperent to every candid reader that I did not in any way neglect the interests of the Town in the matter complained of, when able to be present. I did not omit those precautionary measures, which were necessary to procure the interests of the Town, and that my political friends were present on my behalf, and only failed in securing all that was required in consequence of a misapprehension as to the nature of the security held by the Town.

Before leaving this subject I must confess that while I fully exhonerate my political friends in Peterboro', from every intentional slight, with reference to the affairs of the Town requiring parliamentary attention, yet I am bound to say that in consequence of the management of much of the business of the Town being intrusted to the direction of political opponents, in the council, information was withheld or only imperfectly given, and my opportunities of attending to the interests of the Town and county, were fewer than they might have been under other circumstances.

Having disposed of that part of the article referring to public matters, I must call your attention to the latter part, having reference more particularly to a private matter in which the most casual observer cannot fail to notice the animus to which dictated the whole article. Here the editor gives vent to his natural propensities for attacking, abusing, and villifying all who stand in his way, by "retailing some whisperings," which if breathed at all, must have been manufactured in the neighborhood of the Review office, to gratify the morbid taste of its editor, and which otherwise had no foundation.

It is so far true that I had a claim against Mr. Boulton, lessee of the Cobourg road, but it is utterly untrue that I made its payments a condition of my supporting the bill referred to; it is untrue that the claim was arranged or agreed to be arranged at that time. It is further utterly untrue that any claim which I had against Mr. Bolton was ever spoken about to my knowledge, during the time the bill in question as before the house.

And it is true that my claim against Mr. Boulton remains exactly in the position it did when the Bill was passed—so much for the veracity of the Review, and the whisperings to which he gives currency.

As, however, I did oppose the Bill in question at one stage, and as my doing so was made ground of serious charges against me at Cobourg, I may as well take the opportunity of stating the facts connected with that matter so far as I am concerned with it. When the Bill was first introduced, believing some means of relief necessary for the interests of the road, I supported it. After its second reading I had occasion to pass over the road, I found the works were suspended, and the laborers who had been employed on the Road were without work, and unless the wages they had already earned, and were consequently without the means of supporting their families where they were or of removing to other places where they could find employment, many of them applied to me, complaining bitterly of the injustice proposed to be perpetrated by the bill which would take the road out of the hands of the lessee, and deprive him of the means of paying them. On the bill coming from the committee, I observed that while provision was made for payment of other liabilities, none was made for the laborers. On noticing this, I pointed out the omission to Mr. Bunnion, and told him I should oppose the bill unless this was altered.

The Post Master General, who had charge of the bill afterwards took and accepted my reasons for opposing the bill, and I stated them as above. He then gave me his word of honor that all the laborers referred to should be paid, and stated that a cheque for a large sum due to Mr. Boulton for work done was then in his hands to be applied in paying the laborers, and which was sufficient to pay all the claims. On this assurance I withdrew my opposition to the bill which then passed. On my return I informed the parties who had claims, of the assurance I had from Mr. Smith and authorized them to make any use they deemed best of the information thus communicated.

In conclusion, I will refer very briefly to the article in the Review of the 29th of August, in which the editor returns to the charge, republishes the exculpatory compliment and extracts from the shilpargings for which he had previously given currency, and moreover waxes quite indignant at the thought that I should have repeatedly treated all such indictments that charges which he chooses to promulgate, and describes the dreadful consequences that must ensue from the righteous indignation of my constituents in consequence of my not choosing to notice the lucubrations of an insolent scribblerwho does not hesitate to avow as his motive, securing the "subscribing of public men to his views and interests, as the price of his forbearance. Now sir, as I am not now, and do not wish to become a political adventurer dependant upon the good will or forbearance of such men as the editor of the Review, I can afford to treat with perfect indifference either their favor or their frown. While the position which I now occupy, viewed as the spontaneous gift of those who conferred it, is a most gratifying proof of their confidence, and I should be base indeed, did I use that position for unworthy or dishonourable purposes. Yet its cost would be too great were its price the necessity of noticing the puny attacks of every impudent literary scavenger who chooses to employ his leisure in making and giving them circulation.

I shall be ready when opportunity offers to resign my trust into the hands of those who conferred it, leaving it with them to judge of the past, and choose for the future. As stated in the meeting at Peterboro', I gave these explanations in deference to what I consider due to the electors of Peterboro', to whom while I hold my present position, I shall consider myself accountable for my public acts. Satisfied that they are sufficiently intelligent to take care of their own interests, as they have already done, notwithstanding the opposition of the Review and its sapient editor,

I remain,
yours truly

SIR,—You will oblige by allowing me space to acknowledge the prompt payment by the State Fire Insurance Company of my loss by the disastrous fire of the 13th of last month, through their agent here, James Hall Esq.

W. COULTER.

Peterboro', Nov. 16.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

Norwood, Nov. 16.

SIR,—I see by the correspondence of the Review's chat-chatter, a pretended account of the Reform meeting in this village. I would only say that such a parcel of lies I never sees before in print unless it was in that paper, no decent journal being willing to prostitute itself to become the mouth piece of a losing village politician like the individual who writes chit-chat from Asphodel.

In the first place, Sir, the stated number present was false; in the next place no manifestations of dissention were apparent, except from Ptolemy, jr., and another cur of the same stamp from Hastings, who went into the hall knowing well that none but Reformers were invited, and none but such were required; yet they must go there to make disturbance, and if possible to turn the meeting to their own account. But, fortunately they were foiled in their disgraceful intentions, and the only means they had left to show their spite and malice towards Mr. Short and his friends was to pen a batch of lies and send them to the Review for publication.

Ptolemy, jr., will find it much better for himself in the long run if he lets these things alone, and employs his time in learning something of the profession which he pretends to practice, and if he would endeavor to become a "well of living waters" instead of a stagnant pool, the effluvia of which is so dangerous to the moral body, he must give up some of his living practices and mend his ways.

I sincerely hope the Township of Asphodel will no longer be so disgracefully misrepresented by the green-eyed pen of Ptolemy, jr., and that in future that he may not be mistaken for a decent man he should head his correspondence "Chit chat from a quack quack."

Yours truly,
Cromwell.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—I am called upon by the Review to give proof of my former statement that the present agitation of the Methodist Conference for a share of the University fund for Victoria College is selfish in its character—and if not to retract the statement. And I am taken to task rather severely for misrepresenting the speeches of Mr. White and Dr. Stinson on the occasion of the Public Meeting on behalf of the College. And worse than all I am held up as a "sad example of the absence of religious education and the consequence absence of moral principle." How fortunate for me that in the latter part of my life I should have fallen in with so kind an individual as the editor of the Review, who having in his younger days enjoyed the privilege which I have been denied—a religious education—undertakes to lecture me on moral principle, and explain things to me which have sadly bothered me. It is true, Mr. Editor, that the greater portion of my life has been passed in the back-woods of Canada, that I have not enjoyed the privilege of attending a "Christian Brothers'" School, but nevertheless I have picked up here and there enough to lead me to discriminate between truth and error, and once having satisfied with what is truth and what is right I hold on to them. However, I do not wish this controversy to take a personal turn; I do not want to damage any one and I do not want any one to trouble themselves about my education or anything else. I am known just now as an opponent of the spoliation scheme, I make statements and use arguments against that scheme as instituted by a body of the people. If I make wrong statements or use fallacious arguments—show their fallacy. He who in a controversy uses disparaging personal reflections, betrays the weakness of his cause. Truth, to be sustained, requires not the exercise of the amenities of life, and relying on the stability of the cause I advocate I shall proceed to deal with the subjects above in the order I have introduced them.

First, as to this selfishness of this move I would refer to the meeting held in this Town on the 20th ult., where the leaders of the speaker's speeches was "aid to Victoria College," and I appeal to the unbiased persons present if the advocacy that night was not selfish.

I refer in the next place to the letter of Rev. Mr. Howards, in the Montreal Witness in September last. It would be difficult to construe a passage of it as manifesting a thought about others getting what he sees for Methodists. He rather rebukes them for saying or thinking the Methodists should not "disturb the endowment." There is no other denomination that I know of wanting to disturb it. It is not very likely they will help the spoliators to what they took so long time and pains to do. His stand and clear facts is to enjoy that I will experience it to your cost. They will ask that if Mr. M. opposes the endowments of the body, what we must not expect before all is done. He says

"The Methodist people like peace. They are disposed to be the friends of all, the enemies of none; and, after all, the total supply was only to be regarded as auxiliary to what we have already. Rome had many aqueducts, several of which were successfully ruined two or three storeys, as science improved and higher supplies were obtained, and the citizens required the water to be discharged at a higher level. The only difference between their case and ours is that they were Romans and we are Londoners—a difference, we admit, but one which we may make some humble attempts to remove, especially seen that Glasgow has set us the example.

And I finally refer to the resolutions of the Kingston District College Convention, given in the last Review. They certainly profess liberality, but are nevertheless selfish; I mean those of them touching the fund. The 3rd resolution says—"While we do not desire to see the University of Toronto deprived of a fair and just support"—what considerate souls, don't wish to destroy the University of Toronto—"we do urge our claim to a share of the University endowment"—our claim, no word of others here—"to be divided on some equitable principle"—Does this, Mr. Editor, mean to be divided among the Methodists, or only between the University and the Methodists? The latter appears to be the meaning of the paragraph—and further "and we therefore pledge ourselves to urge upon the Legislature by petition, and if need be by the exercise of our franchise, the principles set forth in the Conference resolutions, and we believe that this claim will be supported by other denominations." Very likely that the Methodist claim will be opposed by all other denominations. The 4th resolution is the sleekest of the lot, but objectionable nevertheless. It wants no peculiar advantage to the W. M. Church in the shape of a Theological School, but "simply to obtain a suitable provision for our youth on Christian principles" and winds up with a be-ye-warmed and be-ye-clothed expression in the following philanthropic language "and we shall heartily rejoice in any measure which will accord to other denominational institutions the justice which we ask for our own." With the exception of the last clause, I think no unprejudiced person but will think with me that the move in Kingston, as elsewhere, is selfish. "Let us have our share of the fund—you work for us till we get it, then we will "heartily rejoice" in any measure you may introduce to get your share." Such supremely benevolent persons deserve canonization. More of these resolutions anon. But I must hasten to meet the next charge,—that of misrepresenting Mr. White and Dr. Stenson at the Peterborough meeting. As it regards Mr. White, I state distinctly that what appeared in the Examiner, as his speech, was more correct than what appeared in the Review. Mr. White could not take his own speech down—his manufactured one was not the one he delivered. It is not what Mr. White intended to say, but what he did say. I repeat that Mr. White, as well as the Chairman and Dr. Stinson, dwelt upon the importance of a religious education—which with Mr. White is a sine quo non—and urged the claims of Victoria College upon the ground of its giving a religious education—of its dispensing "pious literature." Mr. White's own words more than once repeated. Dr. Stinson's speech in the Review and Examiner was nearly the same. The only important point left out in the Review was the Doctor's ignoring the voluntary principle—a most important omission, however. I had no object in misrepresenting, and would scorn so mean a way to accomplish a purpose; and I have yet to learn that I misrepresented either.

And as to the last charge of your cotemporary, I scarce know what to say. A man devoid of "moral principle" not having gone to a "separate" or religious school, having had merely a mere secular education, not having a fair regard for truth, &c. It is a pity then that pupils of religious schools do not themselves show a better regard for truth than they do.—However I am no way anxious either to defend my own character or to run down others. My character is not dependant upon newspaper scribblers, and therefore, I can afford to pass by the jibes of your cotemporary. He that lives in a glass house, however, should not throw stones. The Review, by a sort of wholesale defamation, seeks either to anger me or to run me off the track. In both of these he will miss the mark. I intend to oppose the scheme he is trying to uphold with all the power I can command, and it may be he will find me "dangerous" before all is over. He will find me big enough game yet. If the Review had only put "Conference" in place of "Convention," wanting a "thunder bone," he would have hit it; and if you, Mr. Editor, had put the foundation of the Draper Administration, on the "lava," instead of "laws," that would have been right; and if he is at a loss to understand this, I may, possibly, in the "plenitude of my generosity," strive to enlighten him, as he has done me in describing so admirably the difference between "denominational" and "sectarian." I beg to tender my thanks to the Review for this definition; it is a patent one.

Having extended this letter farther than I intended, I shall merely say, in conclusion, that I trust any further discussion on this vexed question will be conducted on the merits of the question, and not on the demerits of the parties conducting it.—"Measures, not Men," is the motto of the Review—let him act in accordance with his motto. I should touch upon some other matters, which I must defer till another opportunity.

I am, Mr. Editor,
Yours, &c.,
J. E.

P. S.—Since the Review has been so good as to give us the Kingston resolutions will it please also give the famous Conference resolutions, which have caused this hubbub.

A Grave Question.

From the Chicago Press and Tribune.

The alarming natural increase of the slave population of the south, taken in connection with the mad project for re-opening the African slave trade, suggests the grave inquery—What shall be done to keep down this dangerous element, which is growing in our midst to such unpreventable proportions? It is an undoubted fact that the laws of nutriment increase, which are swelling the black race in the United States, will not be suspended to accommodate our peril. On the contrary these persons who have a qualified supervision over the matter are exercising their ingenuity, the patriarchal herdsmen, to double and quadruple their stock of insurrection power by every means at their command, decent and indecent. The ancient Spartans, perceiving the necessity of thinning out a servile race [illegible] with fearful promptness, they [illegible] adopted the expedient of a periodical massacre—sweeping up a given number of Helots in a determinate rule, and turning upon them a murderous band of young herdsmen, every week in the fashion of modern Fejee killing. But even this system did not prevent several bloody insurrections, in which many of the first families of Sparta were exterminated. The question then cannot be adopted in this country for several reasons. Slaves are worth too much money per head to be thus needlessly [illegible]? The moral sentiments of the [illegible] would [illegible] it, and perhaps lead to the forcible liberation of the entire black race. The most desperate conflict that ever overthrown the Italian peninsula was the servile war [illegible] by Spartacus in the year 71 (B.C.)—One of the most bloody and successful revolutions on record was the rising of slaves in Hayti in 1791. Less than three years ago a popular tumult among a few hundreds of slaves along the Cumberland River, shook the States of Kentucky and Tennessee like an earthquake.

No future event can be calculated on with more absolute certainty than a mighty social convulsion in the southern half of the Union, unless some step is taken to check the increase of the servile race. The nature of things is not to be thwarted. History is not to be shouted out of her dues.—It is only a question of time, and the longer the solution of the problem is postponed by conspirac, the more fearful will be the ultimate catastrophe.

THE CHINA EXPEDITION!

HOW Mr. WARD GOT to PEKIN.

ENGLAND TO TAKE PART IN THE CONGRESS AT THE REQUEST OF SARDINIA.

Alliance between Russia and Prussia.

The Builders' Strike Working.

Portland, Nov. 16th.

The Hungarian arrived here at 10 a. m. yesterday.

The Times, speaking of the builders' strike, says the number of men who had resumed work under the dictation, up to Saturday last, was 12,638.

The Admiralty notify that in future all ships employed to transport troops as well as convict ships, are to have four of their boats fitted with either Clifford's or Rynaston's lowering apparatus.

EXPEDITION TO CHINA.

The Times is urgent in pressing on the government the necessity of dispatch:—It says if we are at the leading place by March we can do the work well in one year, but if we are later than April, we are almost certain to take two years about the business, and double our risks and expenses. We hope that no desire of French co-operation will induce us to carry out our politeness to so expensive an extent as to wait for them. If they should not be ready to go with us we can divide the task with them, and meet them at Pekin, or expect them at Shee Taing. Perhaps, also, we may meet the Americans there, if private American letters from China speak the truth. If Mr. Ward was, with shrewd intent to ridicule, being drawn to Pekin by a mule and donkey, tandem fashion, and if his ratified treaty is found to be destitute of the only useful stipulation the draft contained, that is to say the regulations for trade and tariff, then we may conceive that the Americans may by the time have considered that their humility has not answered; we, however, want no help.

Throughout the whole of yesterday and the previous night, a gale of wind equally in duration, and occasionally in fury, that of last week, appears to have swept over the country. At Eastbourne, Sussex, the gale is said to have been terrific.

THE CONGRESS.

The Paris correspondent of the Advertiser says it is at the urgent request of the King of Sardinia that the British Government had consented to take part in the European Congress. He represented that otherwise the unfortunate Italians would be delivered over bound hand and foot to their oppressors, and no voice would be raised in their behalf save his state of Italy. The Emperor's letter is said to have produced a very bad effect at Florence.

The extreme party are gaining strength, and troublesome times are expected. Persons are being despatched from Tuscany, Modena, and Parma to pray Victor Emmanuel at once to accept the annexation, and to refuse to join the Congress under the conditions proposed by France and Austria.

The interview between Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi on the 28th provoked much discussion. It was asked whether the visit was to persuade Garibaldi to lay down his arms, or to concert with that popular chief of the Italian independence, in order to resist the joint policy of Austria and France.

The Post's Paris correspondent says, that the French government has opposed the proposed loan which Tuscany was negotiating with a house in Paris. This, as well as other passing events, when known in Italy will produce a bad effect.

The Times's city article says the intelligence of the friendly understanding between Russia and Prussia seems calculated to have a favorable influence on prices from its being likely to interpose a partial check against new European wars.

The official Gazette publishes another decree regulating the terms upon which the new loan is to be effected, namely by subscription of the sale of 6,000,000 frettes by public sub leave Hintang any day after the 19th. The edict was an answer to a communication of the American Minister, informing the authorities that he was prepared and ready to exchange the treaty at any time and place which they might appoint. On the morning of the 20th Mr. Ward and suite arrived at Pietang, where they were received by an escort and conducted to Pekin with every show of respect. They first travelled four miles across the country in covered carts, striking at Ofsiko some ten miles above Tientsang; thence proceeded in the junks to Tung Chau, distant twelve miles from Pekin, of which it is the port. There they again took carts for the capital. They passed no less than six or eight barriers between Pietang and Tung Chau; not one of them, however, being in repair or backed by forts. The boatmen said they were partly to stop the English and partly to afford shelter to junks when the ice was broken up. The legation remained at Pekin fifteen days, during which time they were confined to their quarters, not, however, as prisoners, for they were at liberty at any moment to walk out, but the commissioners refused the use of horses or guides, leaving it optional with Mr. Ward to grant permission to walk out or not as he saw fit. They would, doubtless, however, have closed the gates entirely had not that gentleman taken a firm stand at the first interview, informing Kueiliang that as soon as his movements should be at all restricted, he should close all interviews and demand a return escort. It seems that the Emperor was very anxious to see Mr. Ward, but that he also persisted upon his performing "kotow," that is prostrating himself nine times with his head to the ground, which was positively refused as being against the principles of His Esculapey. The result of this was that upon the fourteenth day of their stay it was concluded to receive the President's letter at Pekin, and to send his Excellency back to Pietang to exchange the treaty, and next day they returned accordingly. They arrived at Pietang on the 18th, and the treaties were then exchanged.

An English prisoner, named John Powell was given up. This man who was a seaman, on board the Highflyer, and who a cooper, had been captured on the 25th of June, fearing for his life, had proclaimed himself an American. The Chinese informed Mr. Ward of this, and intimated their readiness to give him up as an American, if he would demand him. This, however, the latter could not do, as the man had been taken while fighting for the flag of another nation. Anxious to serve the poor fellow, he intimated that it would be a great personal favor if they would turn him over, and as such it was done. He is now on board the Powhattan.

The correspondent of the London Times has taken the whole affair as a humiliation to a great nation, and which was intended as such.

The British and French men of war remain at Shanghai.

A large business has been done in Tea at Foochoon for the United States at unchanged rates.

FURTHER BY THE CITY OF BALTIMORE.

TWO DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

PROCLAMATION OF GARIBALDI.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times, says the news is vital enough, for according to all human calculations, we may reckon on a rising in Naples before long.

The Pays's correspondent says the Austrian Government is affording every facility to the Napolitan agents at Trieste, in recruiting for a Foreign Legion to replace the Swiss, and for a Body Guard to his Sicilian Majesty. Corps of all nations are assigned and forwarded on to Gaeta. Garibaldi has addressed a proclamation to the Neapolitans. The following are extracts:—

"TO OUR BROTHERS OF NAPLES!

"Brothers, we have combatted the Austrians; we have fought these insolent oppressors of Italy, and we have beaten them. We have fought as Italians fight when united, and you were not with us. The shout of victory was heard in every dialect except yours, and we know your hearts beat high in the cause of the country; yes, Providence has decreed the union and alliance of our family, of this poor Italian family.

"Foreigners and priests labor in vain. In vain they seek to sow discord, to corrupt the baptism whom they divided often, and so often sold to the strangers in vain. Our brothers of the South have cleared the minds of our brothers of the North. The sons of the Procedas, the Masnadellas and the Piers, have grasped the victorious hand of the soldiers of Palestro and San Martino."

WRECK OF THE ROYAL CHARTER.

A gentleman, writing from Bangor, after visiting the wreck on Wednesday evening, says:—At dusk the only parts of the ship standing were a small part of the stern, with the wheel and screw-lifting apparatus. She struck at 3 o'clock, on Wednesday morning and broke up at 7 o'clock. Before striking her cables parted, one after another. She tried to stream off the coast, but the wind blowing a hurricane, she drifted ashore. Blue lights and rockets were fired for several hours before she struck. Several bodies were washed ashore, the majority greatly mutilated.—Men were putting up sovereigns off the rocks, and the utmost guard was much wanted. The Collector of Customs is doing his best to protect the ship and her cargo.

Liverpool, Oct. 27—Midnight.

Reporters have arrived from the scene of the wreck, and state that the vessel struck at 2, p. m., the storm being too great for her cables. At first but little alarm was felt, but some imminence of a dreadful death was apparent to all. One female under seven years, and made fast a hammer by which several lives were saved, and more might have been had not the vessel parted in two with a dreadful crash, the funnel and machinery giving way. The passengers and crew broke either killed by the falling masts or perished in the waves.

Four hundred and seventy persons were lost, and only thirty one saved. All the women perished. There was no pilot on board, the signals made when the vessel struck at Point Lynas not having been answered. The Anglesea, it is expected, will be recovered.

The Mistral, a brig of about 200 tons, has been totally lost and the crew drowned. A boy was washed ashore guarded William Robertson. The Anna, of Whitehaven, has been totally lost and the crew drowned. The Mary, which drove ashore, was burned from Dublin for Liverpool. The cargo was landed. The Thalia, of Cardiff was totally lost, but the master, with five men, were saved. The Rose, of Bridgewater, is totally lost, but the crew were saved. The Dispatch, of and from Shoreham, struck and became a total wreck at fifteen minutes. The crew were saved, with the exception of the second mate. Five other vessels are ashore at Hirscobine Bay, and breaking up. The accounts from Falmouth state that the Cuba, of White, and another vessel, are on the Western beach, total wrecks; twelve hands were drowned.

The Silva, of Glasgow, has been totally lost; crew saved. At Polkelli, a large bark, laden with sugar, went ashore; the crew (Spaniards) were saved, except one boy; it was thought she was bound from Havana for Liverpool. At Rye, the Isabella, of Sunderland, went ashore and broke up; crew saved. The Caroline, of Christiansand, got ashore at Dungeness, and went to pieces; three of the crew were drowned. At Stottian, near Bute, the Beverley, of Cork, is a total wreck; one man lost. At Bristol, three pilot-boats were sunk; crews saved. At St. David's, Martha, of Meath, is a total wreck; crew saved.

DESCRIPTION OF THE GALE IN LIVERPOOL.

From the Liverpool Post, Oct. 27.

One of the heaviest gales experienced at this port for several years occurred yesterday. As usual on similar occasions, considerable damage was done to the shipping both on the river and in the channel, and we regret to learn that some of the disasters were accompanied with loss of life. The weather for some days past has been unsettled, and yesterday morning about 8 o'clock a smart breeze sprung up from N. N. W. The wind gradually increased until about 11½, when the gale assumed a terrific character. The tide being at flood, our river presented a scene seldom witnessed, the sea running so high as to render navigation during three or four hours of the day exceedingly difficult, if not perilous. Vessels were in imminent danger of drifting from their moorings and running ashore, or probably encountering a worse calamity. Yesterday was a Spring tide, the height, as given in the almanac, being 18 feet 2 inches. Owing to the gale, however, the height of the tide must have been two or three feet more than that stated, for the water was on a level with some of the pier-heads, at times washing completely over them.

At St. George's pier the waves ran close up to the baths, and for some time the road in this direction was impassible. The north landing stage, from its situation, was more particularly exposed to the fury of the storm. Notwithstanding its immense size, it rolled heavily, at times the sea making a complete breach over the north end. Several steamboats were unable to come alongside to receive passengers for the American screw steamer announced to sail in the afternoon. The North American and the City of Baltimore did not leave the river owing to the fury of the gale, and were detained until this morning, when they will proceed.

In the town slates were blown from the roofs of houses, and other similar casualties occurred, but, so far as we could learn, though there were one or two narrow escapes, no one sustained any injury.—During the gale considerable excitement prevailed in the neighborhood of St. George's Church, consequent on a report having got abroad that the top of the church spire waved two and fro from the action of the wind.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

The Paris correspondent of the Times reports the state of affairs between England and France as to the Congress as being more encouraging, and it was believed that after all an English Plenipotentiary would take his seat with the representatives of the other Powers, for the purpose of settling the Italian question.

The French expeditionary force to Morocco is to be augmented by two brigades, including 2 regiments of Zouaves.

The London Herald's correspondent says the tone of the semi-official journals of Paris is daily becoming more acrimonious towards England, the Italian difficulty and the Suez canal affair being the principal subjects for abuse.

The Constitutionel contains an article on the Suez Canal of a decidedly menacing character.

A letter of the 22nd inst., from Naples, states that her Majesty's ship Exmouth has been telegraphed from Malta, to protect British interests at Naples.

The London Times (city article) says the aspect of French politics continues to depress the market, and the news regarding the Royal Charter has for the moment added to the tendency to dullness. At the close of business, however, there was more strength. Money continues in active demand, and in exceptional cases only the rate is below the bank medium. The market for British railway shares has been dull and flat, and a decline of ¼ a ½ per cent. has taken place in all the heavier descriptions.

REACTIONARY PLOT IN TUSCANY.

The correspondent of the Times states that the Tuscan Government has got scent of a plot with a reactionary intent, in which as usual, the Red Republicans and Mazzinians were in league with the Grand Ducal and priestly authority. The papers seized afford pretty clear evidence of a pretty extensive Reactionary Republican plot. The conspirators belong to the upper classes, and possess considerable funds, as they enlisted a number of people of the lower rank, some of whom received as much as 3s. 10d. a day.

INTERESTING FROM SPAIN.

Our advices from Madrid are to the 25th October.

Some of the journals relate that the day on which the truce agreed upon was to expire that was to settle the question of peace or war, much was the anxiety of the people of Madrid, that from midnight to one o'clock in the morning, a great number of persons remained at their windows waiting for the salute of twenty-one guns, announcing the commencement of hostilities.

Letters received in Spain from Gibraltar state that the Spanish army is watched very closely, and that nothing in these or thought of that is not immediately made known to the English. They report also that disturbances of a serious nature have taken place in the streets of Gibraltar, between the English and Irish men-of-war's men.

A late despatch from Madrid says:—The Spanish Consul gave notice to the Moorish Government on the 19th inst., that he was about to quit Tangier immediately.—Marching orders have been given to the troops which assist join the expeditionary corps d'armee. A decree appointing Marshal O'Donnell to be con tinder-in-chief of the military forces is expected to appear in the military Gazette of to-morrow.—The Marshal will start at the end of the week. General enthusiasm prevails among the people.

At the request of M. Mon, the Spanish ambassador in Paris, Marshal Randon, the Minister of War, has placed material of war at the disposal of the Spanish Government, and has declared that the Emperor will support the military operations of Spain in the war against Morocco, by advances in a similar way to those made to Piedmont during the late war.

The Emperor Napoleon, says the Paris correspondent of the London Star, has peculiar reasons for wishing to foment the war with Morocco—a dangerous and troublesome neighbor for France, and one who has long threatened annoyance to Algiers. "I have been told," adds the writer "that the Emperor is as joyous as a school-boy, and rubs his hands with the utmost glee at the prospect of this war, whereon no profit can be drawn but for himself."

The commander of the Spanish naval forces now assembled in the Bay of Algesiras is Brigadier Quesada, comparatively speaking a young man, and well known as one of the most valiant officers in the service of Queen Isabella.

The Spanish journals estimate the amount of treasure in the possession of the present Emperor of Morocco, at £13,200,000—a sum, they think that will well cover the expenses of the Spanish army of observation, even if no further hostilities should take place.

The Madrid journals state that the force with which the Government will commence hostilities with Morocco will be forty battalions of the line, sixteen of riflemen, eleven squadrons of cavalry, eight pieces of campaign artillery, (more than half of them rifled) and a siege train. It was intended, it is said, to sail out under arms, sixty provincial battalions.

One of the Madrid journals, the Espana states that almost all the foreign Ministers, and among them the Minister of Great Britain, had called on the Minister of Foreign Affairs to express the opinion that the war with Morocco was a just one.

A Madrid despatch of the 25th ult., says:—The rumours which have been current regarding a peaceful settlement with Morocco are without any foundation. General Zabala and Serrano and others, chiefs of the army, took their departure this evening.—General Ovrano leaves on Saturday.

A letter dated Gibraltar, Oct. 16, received at Plymouth by a naval officer, says that the Spanish have there one ship of the line, three corvettes, one sloop-of-war, and three paddle steamers.

The French have one three decker, four two deckers, and three smaller vessels.

The British force consists of the Marlborough, the Edgar, the Neptune, the Orion the Princess Royal, the Centurion, the Victor Emanuel, the Conqueror, the Cæsar, the Doris, the Scylla, the Cadmus, the Scourge and the Lapwing.—The Edgar, Neptune, and Prince Royal are expected to sail shortly for England, and the Cæsar for Malta. The Vulture is at Tangier.

The London Times of 28th ultimo says it has often dwelt on the impossibility of a period of quiet following a period of success, and now after the war with Austria is concluded, there cannot be any doubt that France is preparing to interfere in the quarrels of Europe more actively than was expected, and it is quite possible that the French and Spanish forces will combine to carry out the plans for obtaining redress for the insults at Ceuta. But the subjection of Spain to French influence, and the formation of a system of which France is the chief, and Spain, Piedmont, the Papal States, and Naples are the dependents, deserves the attention of every politician among us.

The London News of the 26th ult., endeavours to prove that in going to war with Morocco, Spain is the instrument of France and that collusive understandings exists between them. The consequence of this is the British Government, whose Mediterranean interests are involved in any territorial aggrandisement along the Straits of Gibraltar, finds itself in the alternative of calmly witnessing the progress of the Spanish army, or forcibly interfering between the belligerents, now that its representations have been set at defiance.

The London Globe remarks that when Spain proposes to take possession, as it were, of a portion of the Mediterranean, to convert Ceuta from a landing place into a stronghold, and the nucleus of an Africo-Spanish territory, the question assumes dimensions which no British Government can undertake to settle independent of public opinion. The Globe adds:—The commercial classes have too great an interest in the freedom of the Straits not to make their voices heard to vindicate the right of the passage.

Kossuth and Massini.

One incident of note is the adhesion—or, more strictly speaking, the rumored adhesion—of Guiseppe Massini to the cause of the Sardinian King. A letter is spoken of as having been written to Victor Emanuel by Massini, offering that sovereign the support of the republican party in Italy, of which the latter has long been the acknowledged head, on condition of his "going in" for the whole Peninsula, and giving unity and independence of foreign dominion to its entire population. If such a sacrifice of principle is to be made, Mazzini most certainly is not the man who should make it; for it could scarcely have escaped his acute intelligence that the battle of Republicanism would have to be fought again, if republicanism in Italy was not to be a mere name and nothing more; and that in such a case it would be fought at a decided disadvantage. Kossuth played very nearly the same game as Mazzini is now reported to be playing, and the world knows where he now is, namely, at the lowest point of political degredation. He preferred the nationality of his native country, which is a sentiment, to republicanism, which good or bad, right or wrong) is a principle, and he fell. "If the 'great Devil,'" said Kossuth in one of those insidious orations which he made before his secret alliance with Louis Napoleon became known even to his dearest friends—"If the great Devil came and offered me the liberation of Hungary, I would take it from him with thanks." The French Emperor came, or rather Kossuth went to the French Emperor, and the liberation of Hungary was offered; but when the reckoning came to be called, Kossuth was cheated out of his promised reward for the sacrifice of his political soul.—What the secret "consideration" for this sacrifice was is best known to the contracting parties; but it has been stated, on the authority of the Times, that three millions of francs was to be paid by the French Emperor to the Hungarian Committee and it is well known that this committee consisted of Kossuth, Klapka, and Teleki. With the example of Kossuths deplorable fall before his eyes, it never can be supposed that Massini would follow the course which placed Kossuth in his present low position; and, at all events, it is only just to suspend adverse judgement on Massini until the fact as regards his offer of fealty to Victor Emanuel is fully proved. This subject has been dealt upon because Mazzini is "a power" in Italy far more influential than princes or pope with his fellow-countrymen; and because, under these circumstances, tamperil Government in Italy is not possible without his consent or connivance.—London Observer.

Steps have been taken in South Australia, in favor of the construction of a Grand Trunk Railroad, to run 400 miles north of Adelaide.

THE 78th HIGHLANDERS.

A correspondent of the Times (says the Inverness Courier) complained a few weeks ago that his gallant regiment was sent direct from India to Scotland—that they are not allowed "to land and be honoured by the people." We can no more be called the people of England than the three tailors of Tooley Street; but this is the district from which the 78th Highlanders sprang, and it was a graceful compliment to them and to us, to give the Highlanders the first opportunity of paying homage to the patriotism and valour of our countrymen. We are all proud of the gallant fellows; they have done the Highlands infinite honor, and we are grateful to the Horse Guards for recognising the bond the bond that exists between us. On our side we have not been slow to testify our regard publicly and privately. The regiment has been feted and compliment on all hands; and honors, such as we have it in our power to bestow, continue to be showed us on them. The Nairn Ball has been already noticed; it is to be followed by a banquet on Tuesday evening, to which the whole regiment is invited. The Inverness banquet and ball comeoff on Thursday and Friday next week. and they are expected to be the most brilliant that have ever taken place in the capital of the Highlands. Many private entertainments have been given to the officers, the most distinguished of which took place on Monday evening at Rosehaugh, the hospitable seat of Sir James and Lady Anne Mackenzie of Seatwell. About two hundred invitations were issued, and nearly that number attended.—Sir James' family have many associations with the 78th. His uncle, Major-General Mackenzie of Suddy, for many years commanded one of the battalions of the regiment, and was killed when in command of a division of the British army at Talavera in 1809. Another uncle, Colonel Lewis Mackenzie of Seatwell, raised the Ross and Cromarty Rangers; from these very many fine young men volunteered into the 78th in days long gone by; and ever since the regiment was formed, cadets and adherents of the family of Seatwell have added to its force and shared in its triumphs More than twenty officers of the 78th were present at the ball at Rosehaugh on Monday evening; and another public body was honored with an invitation, viz., the Black Isle Farmer's Society, about ninety of whom, including their families, were present. Rosehaugh was appropriately ornamented on the occasion. The hall and staircase were hung with Mackenzie tartin; over the principal entrance were the colours of the Ross and Cromarty Rangers, and in front under a stag's head, a banner was suspended on which many names and devices were worked in letters of gold. The principal of these were the battles in which the 78th have been engaged —"The Elephant" and the regimental motto, "Cuidich'n Rhi," together with the war-cry of the Mackenzies, "Tulloch Ard" the burning mountain, stags' heads, and the sun in splendor—Seatwell's own crest—and the motto "Sine Macula." A relict that attracted the attention of the officers was the sword worn by Major-General Mackenzie of Suddy when he fell at Talavera.

Affairs in Mexico.

From the New York Times.

An interesting letter from our special correspondent in the city of Mexico appears in the Times of to-day. From the general tenor of advices now received, as well as the statement of our correspondent, it is evident that there is more unity of action on the part of the liberals, and that they have recently gained some military advantages, more especially throughout the district which Maquez has been attempting to conquer for several months. The various reports of disaster to the Liberal troops that have been coming thick and fast from Mexico for the past month, the statement of the victories of Woll, one of the military chieftains of the church, over the liberals, and his occupation of San Luis Potosi, all prove to have been fabrications.

It also appears that the defection of Vidauri does no injury to the liberal cause. On the contrary, his departure from the country will, doubtless, be as beneficial to that interest, as his patriotism was confined to his pocket, and all his acts had for their aim and end his own personal aggrandizement at the expense of the country at large. The preemptitude and unanimity with which the people of his own State, which he had ruled so long, deserted him when he fully disclosed his selfish purposes, ought to be convincing proof that there is great moral strength and determination among the inhabitants of the northern tier of the Mexican States. And it ought to convince the people of the United States how mistaken they are in their opinion, so generally current, that military chieftains, such as Pesquiera or Vidaurri, can induce all or any one of these Northern Mexican States to seceede from the Mexican confederacy, should they attempt anything of the kind. This is the very last steps any one of these States bordering on the United States territory could be induced to take. The mistaken idea to the contrary entertained by our National Government for some years past has caused them to commit serious errors in their diplomatic intercourse with the neighbouring Republic.—The ideas of State Sovereignity entertained by these chieftains and the people they rule is in some respects vague, and in others extravagant; but with all their vagaries and extravagancies, they will always avoid taking any steps calculated to bring within their borders American volunteers or filibusters, with whose plans and influence they are quite familiar.

From all advices at hand, we draw the inference that the Liberals are becoming more united and stronger, while the work of demoralization in the Miramon Government is steadily working its ruin. It is certain that the Government in the city of Mexico is more than ever distressed for want of means, and while it is morally as weak as not to be able to punish one of the parties recently conspiring for its overthrow, it is absurd to suppose it can muster physical courage and means to make any decided demonstration on Vera Cruz, or other important points held by the Liberals.

We learn, also, the important fact that the English Minister, Mr. Otway, who from his high official position, has been able seriously to retard the progressive party, is at last out of the country. In relief from his opposition the liberals gain much, even if Mr. Matthews, now acting English Minister, should not see fit at once to acknowledge the Juarez Government. The instructions of Mr. Mathews are well known to be in that direction, and he is anxious to unite with the American Minister in such a step.

A small steamer has been built in England of steel plates one-eighth of an inch in thickness. She is 70 feet long, 12 feet beam, and 6½ feet deep, and measures 30 tons. She has proved to be an admirable sea boat.
